"M. AND M."

This could stand for "More and More." Really, it indicates the comprehensive agency of Maitt and Myers, at 81/3, Shaftesbury Avenue, where "more and more" of the needs of the directors and artistes can be supplied. "M. and M." has set itself the standard "Never outdone," and Harry Myers tells us that there is no demand that can be made that the firm is not able to meet.

Mr. Myers, senior, has over thirty-three years' experience in the show business in all its branches—kinemas and varieties. Mr. Maitt has a standing in the film Trade that goes back eighteen years, and was the first to produce comedies in this country. Harry Myers is in charge of the film department, and is well known as late manager to Sidney Jay's Agency, and also to Godfrey H. Malin's Productions.

Maitt and Myers undertakes to supply directors with anything that is required in a production, and is also in the position to negotiate the sale of completed pictures. The firm also provides directors with lists of appropriate locations, and, in addition to casting artistes, has also made arrangements for developing and printing negatives.

TO THE RESCUE.

It was at the meeting of the Kinema Club that Colonel A. C. Bromhead mentioned a new scheme that he had in mind for the furthering of British pictures, and last Wednesday the scheme was placed before a gathering of British film managers, directors and Pressmen. We deal with the matter more exhaustively in our next issue:

CAMERAMEN AT WORK

A member of the K.C.S. asked the meeting last week why it was that the name of the cameraman was only occasionally mentioned in reviews. This question is an interesting one, and one which the cameramen should go further into. The film viewers are not to blame. When we go right into the question, it is the cameraman who is at fault, and I believe a member present last week pointed that fact out.

It must be remembered that the film reviewer is a busy man. It must also be remembered that the cameraman's name is usually just a flash—if it is mentioned at all. So that it is very difficult to get the name down. The director's name is usually found on the synopsis, along with the names of the leading artistes, but the reviewer who looks for the name of the cameraman looks in vain.

If all cameramen, as some cameramen now do, would have it stipulated in their contract that their names must be mentioned in the synopsis, then it would ensure their name being mentioned in reviews.

In the "Screen Values" section of the Motion Picture Studio it will be noticed that we give the names of the cameraman and criticise his work.—ED.

Henry Sanders was missing from the last meeting of the Society, the reason being that he has left for America. His object in going there is to film the Washington Peace Conference for Pathé. It is significant to note that an English cameraman is being sent all that way instead of getting an American cameraman to do the work, as is usually the case.

The Society received a letter from George

Woods-Taylor, the late secretary, who is now on his way to India. The K.C.S. has already sent him a Marconigram, wishing him luck, and this he has received. Even though he is many miles away, his thoughts are still with the Society, as can be seen by his letter, in which he says "I hope the unemployment is not so great, and I trust that the Society is getting along all right, although I think I can be pretty certain of this with Mr. Gordon as secretary."

Rodier Heath's letter was discussed at the last K.C.S. meeting. The members present were inclined to agree with the views expressed by Henry Sanders on this page last week. They did not seem to be inclined to give away all the tricks of the Trade to people trying to find cameramen's jobs. It does not look as if the K.C.S. will admit student members, not if the views expressed at the meeting last week are anything to go by. One member pointed out that Rodier Heath should join the Royal Photographic Society.

I believe the Society is now giving quite a number of lectures on moving picture work. The K.C.S. is, of course, and always has been a society purely and simply for professional moving picture cameramen who have had a number of years' experience in the film Trade.

"Topical Budget" should have some good "shots" of the Variety Ball held last week at Covent Garden. I was up in the studio during the evening and saw Danvers-Yates and Wilson taking some stuff of Leslie Henson, Jas. Tate and Tom Webster. There was very little room to work in, but there were plenty of lights fitted up. "TRIPOD."

Getting on in Years.

ONE of the stereotyped stock phrases of after-dinner speeches at trade functions is that "the film industry is only in its infancy." That is not exactly the case. By now the industry ought to be able to regard itself as matured and ought not to persist in using its alleged youth as an excuse for un-youthful indiscretions. The art of picturising drama has been established long enough now for it to accept the responsibilities and obligations of manhood.

"Something Different."

THIS fact is freshly brought home by the commencement in this issue of a series of Reminiscences of the old London Film Company. To any one who has studied the progress of the British film industry the fact that the London influenced the whole industry is un-avoidably patent. It is, for instance, practically impossible to glance through the cast of any current British production without noticing the name of at least one old London player. There was, too, a "something different" about the London.

Its atmosphere is missing from every present-day studio. It was a curious mixture of autocracy, fraternity and hero worship; and much of this revolved around that wonderful personality, the late George Loane Tucker, who, unquestionably, was the D. W. Griffith of the British studio.

Pooling British Films.

IT was at the meeting of the Kinema Club that Colonel A. C. Bromhead made his first public statement respecting a scheme for the pooling of British pictures; this scheme he outlined in detail to a special gathering a few days ago, as we mentioned on this page last week. This scheme cannot fail to have a far reaching effect on the producing industry. In essence, the plan is for there to be a guarantee to the public (via the exhibitors) that there will be a regular stream of British films at the rate of one each week, that these films shall not be block-booked (that is, take-one-take-all) nor blind-booked (that is, book-without-seeing), and shall not be on the long release system, but will be released no longer than six months after trade show.

Equal Opportunities.

THE first year's releases have already been scheduled and commence with a Violet Hopson Production which will be trade shown on July 3, 1922. This will be followed by a regular weekly output of British films so that no exhibitor will be able to excuse his for the formation of the League to put a premium on junk just because it is British-made. But Colonel Bromhead took considerable pains to explain that every film would have to run the gauntlet of Press criticism at the trade shows; as Captain Kimberley (Hepworth) put it, "the automatic elimination of the unfit film." This point is well made. Another point is that the League is not a Trust; it is not a clique of film manufacturers out to monopolise the market for British films; it is not a close trades-organisation for boycotting competitors. It is to be hoped that every existing producing concern will come with the ægis of the League and—this is vital—that the sponsors of the League will give the assurance that all new producing concerns that may come into existence enter freely and equitably into the League if so desired.

Kinema Club Notices

AT a special meeting of the committee it was decided to recommend that membership be thrown open to other sections of those engaged in British studios. Full particulars will be found on page 14.

PLANS are being pushed ahead for opening the Club at Christmas, but this will absolutely depend on the amount of financial support that is forthcoming. This can take the form of ordinary subscriptions, life membership subscriptions and donations.

A sub-committee has been appointed to deal with the financial side of the undertaking and is meeting frequently. (Fuller Club News on page 14).

Complimenting this Journal.

BY the way, we were particularly gratified at the graceful compliment that Colonel Bromhead paid this journal. He explained to those present that "some premature remarks" of his at the Kinema Club meeting had given us an inkling that "something was doing," and he wished to express his "appreciation of the way in which the journalists in question had kept faith with me by not speaking about the matter until the question was opened."

The Social Side.

THIS has always been neglected in the profession, and now that the winter is well established, we think that steps should be taken for a well-organised social function for the producing end of the business. In our opinion the most convenient form is a whist drive, and in our next issue we hope to be able to make a full announcement. Such an event would be the precursor to many other similar functions, and the development of the social spirit in the studio.

neglect of British pictures by stating that there were none available. If full advantage is taken of these facilities the result will be that British films will be on an equal basis with American so far as the exhibitor is concerned, for the one-weekly policy is equal to one half of the demand of the exhibitor. The average kinema uses two features each week; so it is obvious that the British National Film League is not an attempt to boycott American films, for, even assuming that our exhibitors take full advantage of the League's offer, it will mean, at most, that British screens are on a fifty-fifty basis.

Clearing the Air.

THERE are two points suggested by the scheme which require clarifying. In the first place it is possible

Intimate Studio Gossip

Publicity (as sent out by a certain British film actress):—"Miss Blank is a vegetarian—a teetotaler—a non-smoker—a fearless rider—loves dancing—is interested in occult and advanced thought—believes in re-incarnation, both progressive and retrograde—and is a fearless worker for the protection of children and prevention of cruelty to animals." Well, she ought to know!

In talking to a Press representative Sidney Jay did the profession a service by explaining the dangers and the epidemic of "screen-mania." He said: "Over 500 girls call at my office each day, obsessed with the idea that there are plenty of vacancies for beginners. There is not enough work in the entire industry to employ one in a hundred of those desirous of acting. Fully 90 per cent. of these girls are totally unsuitable for the work. They perhaps may be quite good-looking, but lack the photographic quality and screen personality so essential to a successful film star."

It is to be hoped that this statement will be a warning to all who desire to force a passage into the profession, including the "Services Cinema Society." At the same time I regret to notice that Sid admitted that in a crowd he supplied last week were three peers and four titled society women, "who were only too pleased to figure on the screen in the smallest capacity and under assumed names." Surely friend Jay knows by now that if there is any value in a titled player it is the publicity that the person's name affords, and to conceal the name is to destroy even this questionable value. Again I say: we do not want titled (or untitled) screen-struck aspirants!

Another point that Sid Jay makes is worthy of attention. He said: "Quite recently a pretty girl called on me, and I frankly told her she was unsuitable for the screen and advised her to give up the idea. She returned later with the son of a very well-known peer, who put down a cheque for £5,000, told me to engage a cast and director and make a film in which the girl was to play lead. The picture was completed and viewed by renters and buyers, who all turned it down. The film is now on the shelf in my office, and will never be seen. So many films have been made to appease the vanity of various girls that indirectly it is a hindrance to film production in this country. Financing a production which features a pretty but useless screen actress is a hobby which should be discouraged." And we all agree with Mr. Jay.

On the Friday previous to the Trade show at the Alhambra of "Gwyneth of the Welsh Hills," Mrs. Lloyd George saw the picture in Stoll's private theatre, together with her daughter, Megan. The visitors were intensely interested in this screen drama of Welsh life, and Megan went into raptures over the numerous beauty spots in the region of Snowden, which form the backgrounds of so many of the incidents. She recognised Bryn-b-bras Castle as the home of one of her school friends, where she spent a holiday in her childhood, and recalled the fact that a pony bolted down a road shown in the picture with herself and her chum on its back. Which is all very nice, but a Welsh journalistic colleague told me at lunch this week that the film placed a railway station at a village where there is no railway! But why marvel? The Stoll organisation can do anything.

Hepworth City, at Walton, ought to be rechristened Los Angeles-on-Thames. The six large studios are well towards completion, and it is intended to form resident stock companies. Two engines from the German submarine U 19, weighing ninety-four tons, have been adapted at Walton to make the new production centre independent of the sunlight.

ON THE FLOOR With BERTRAM PHILLIPS

Many directors are content to pose in front of a huge staff of assistants and give orders for this to be done and that to be seen to, but not so Bertram Phillips. If there is anything to be done he likes to do it himself, without the aid of a whole studio staff.

He is equally at home directing huge crowds, or just getting a close-up of one of the artistes. He treats his crowd in the same way that he treats his leading artistes, always giving them very explicit instructions and plenty of time to rehearse the scene.

He regards the director's work as a one-man job, and insists on seeing everything that is done in connection with one of his productions.

When he takes the floor, his mind goes right into the work in front of him. Everything round about the set disappears from his mind, and he just sees the set itself with the people on it. There is no hesitation on his part once he starts work; he knows exactly what he wants, and takes care to see that the artiste knows also.

The studios are situated at Oatlands Park, which was acquired for the Crown by Henry VIII. in 1537. James I. and Charles I. occupied the palace, the ruins of which still stand. A grotto, costing over £40,000, was built in the grounds by the Duke of Newcastle from shells of every description from all parts of the world. This weird building is still in existence. Artificial stalactites, inlaid with satin spar, granite and coral, hang from the domed ceilings. The Allied Sovereigns dined there in 1814; in 1921 Leslie Henson used it for making the fun in "All's Button." Men from public schools and universities, with experience of the various technicalities, have been quietly trained to take charge of the new productions. The personnel for the new output will be recruited from the present stock company, which includes Alma Taylor, Chrissie White, Henry Edwards, Gerald Ames and Eileen Dennes. It is not expected that the scheme will fully materialise until the latter part of next year.

My friend, L. Yglesias, writing in the Weekly Despatch, says:—"At a club for kinema artistes, now in course of formation under unexceptionable auspices, the golden-locked heroine of screen romance will sip tea between pictures with the wretch who foully slew her in their last production. Premises have already been secured in a central West End position, and members, I am told, are rolling in rapidly. Only genuine film artistes are eligible, dilettanti and the screen-struck being severely barred." I thank him for his encouraging remarks, but really do wish he had used a different headline. "Clubs for Heroines and Villains" leaves a lot of us out.

Everybody in the whole of the film Trade has been talking about the British Film League which Colonel Bromhead officially launched a few days ago. What is especially of interest to me is that the very first news of this project was given by Colonel Bromhead at the Kinema Club meeting several Sundays ago and over which he presided. At the request of the Colonel we refrained from reporting his statement then until the scheme was fully developed, and we can now congratulate him and all concerned on a brilliant move in the interests of "MEGAPHONE" British productions.

“Truly Wonderful Types.”

“Pickwick Papers” is a film of “types.” And it is a success!

WHY?

Because it was well cast; and ———

Because it was produced by a first-class director.

———READ THE PRESS COMMENTS———

“I am prepared to wager that Pickwick lovers will go to see it again for the sake of the truly wonderful types portrayed in the picture.”—EVENING NEWS.

“... the members of the company ... were so judiciously chosen that physically they managed to appear the walking images of the original illustrations.”—DAILY HERALD.

“The characters are very faithful portraits of those in the book and are not in anyway distorted or burlesqued. The shade of their author could not take possible exception to them.”—KINE WEEKLY.

“The most striking thing about the film is the amazing array of Dickensian types. No two characters are alike ... it takes a very clever man to find and cast the types.”—MOTION PICTURE STUDIO.

WARNINGS TO SCREEN STRUCK

A Casting Director's Human Documents

by L. B. LESTOCQ, Casting Director for F. P.-Lasky

Every branch of the moving picture industry has its own particular humours, but, all the same, I think the giant's share of funny experiences falls to the lot of the studio casting director.

In the course of an eleven years' experience at the task of tailoring human material more or less to fit a whole gallery of screen men and women, it has been my lot to come into contact with a large variety of screen-struck people. In fact, my experiences in this direction have been so varied, and have revealed so many curious kinks and obsessions in the workings of the human mind, that I begin to think that many of those learned gentlemen who devote themselves to the study of psychology would thoroughly enjoy themselves in the casting department of a big moving-picture studio.

They would certainly collect some interesting data on the subject of human vanity and the delusions thereof!

It is the policy of our firm to see all applicants who apply personally with a view to registering their names on our books, for, though we may have no immediate call on their services, we cannot afford to miss any chance of discovering some distinctive "type," which may prove exceedingly useful to us on some future occasion.

Out of the colossal mass of human material which is thus placed at our disposal, we only select possibilities for registration and future reference. And as a warning for the screen-struck, it might not be superfluous to add that these possibilities are a very small minority.

The movies during the past six years have gained so firm a hold on the imagination of the public, that the influx of applicants for "jobs" has increased to at least three times the number that used to register for similar employment before the war.

A casting director therefore now finds himself confronted with a double problem. He must do his best to satisfy the artistic standards of the firm he serves, and also ever bear in mind the principles of economics.

That is our reason for confronting every new film aspirant with the hard fact that we do not care to employ anybody who has not had at least twelve months' practical film experience, even if that experience has only been in crowd work. Furthermore, we ruthlessly turn down the applicant who is professedly anxious to give up any permanent employment for the hazards of a screen career.

There are too many sterling actors of long-trying experience who are finding it increasingly difficult to obtain steady work for us to care to aggravate the present unemployment crisis by passing them over in favour of the raw recruit.

However, the faith of the screen-struck in their own abilities continues unabated and undaunted by the politest scepticism. This faith is, perhaps, most touchingly revealed in the humorous letters we receive from the "undiscovered" in the provinces. Curiously enough, the fashionable complaint of "moveitis" seems to be most prevalent in the Midlands and the Northern Counties.

"Some people say I am pretty, others that I am witty," writes one young lady from Yorkshire. "I am willing to give you the first chance to make me a star."

Another does not think it beside the point to state that she belongs to "one of the oldest families in England." Her other qualification is her "india-rubber face," and she expresses herself as willing to "sell her grimaces to the highest bidder."

We are frequently bewildered by the accomplishments with which our correspondents attempt to make claims on our interest. A lady writes me, for instance, that she is of "very good family, speaks fluent French, German, English, and a little Spanish, and has passed several examinations, Senior Oxford included."

Another states that she was married at twenty, but has divorced her husband (giving full particulars of his commercial standing), also that she was arrested and kept in a German prison during the war under suspicion of espionage. As a slight concession to our prejudices about screen essentials, she does incidentally mention that she is pretty, has a perfect figure and nice teeth—"my own."

Perhaps our most intriguing experience was with a lady of "gypsy blood," whom we never saw, but who kept us for some weeks thrilled with her letters, describing her "eyes like electric lights," and a "mouth like a Cupid's bow that could kiss some." She informed us that she had got as far as the studio gate one morning to apply in the usual manner, but, by some singular paradox, considering her above statements, had lost her nerve at the eleventh hour and gone home again.

Her letters were full of psychical dissertations on thought transference and electric currents. She warned us if at any time we should feel vaguely uneasy, that we could immediately infer she was in telepathic communication with us from afar.

Finding us impervious to the occult, she finally came down to brass tacks and made an appointment for us to meet her at Marble Arch, stipulating that we should carry a folded newspaper in our left hand as a means of identification. Preferring to restrict our activities to the fastnesses of the studio, I regret to say that I must on that occasion have committed a pardonable breach of etiquette and kept a lady waiting.

Sometimes a letter will contain an open threat. One young lady promised herself the sensation of suicide if we failed to engage her by return of mail. As I have not seen her case mentioned in the columns devoted to coroners' inquests, I presume that she thought better of it.

It is easy to understand that youth is naturally lured to the glamour of a screen career. The problem of discouraging hopeless cases is materially complicated when a mother persistently calls with her three daughters and backs them up in their delusions. Another mother made a journey from the North with her daughter on the same hopeless business. For some weeks before she had deluged us with correspondence on the subject, and, as she refused to consider a personal interview as the final word in the matter, we were obliged to write a rather strong letter to the girl's father. This, rather significantly, closed the subject as far as we were concerned.

As a final word of advice to the screen-struck: If you're already earning a steady living, go on earning it and keep off the screen. If you want to earn a living—still keep off the screen.

Polly Emery is busy at the Artistic studios, playing the star part in the three-reel comedy which Manning Haynes is directing.

Gertrude McCoy reached London from South Africa, where she has been for the past three months playing lead for South African Productions. She was met off the boat by her husband, Duncan McKae, on Monday last.

J. Stuart Blackton and Mrs. Blackton have just been presented by the principal members of the cast of "The Glorious Adventure" with a beautiful silver teapot and an ornamental testimonial of their appreciation and enjoyment of the direction of Mr. Blackton and the assistance of Mrs. Blackton in the making of this super-picture in natural colours, which was over four months in production. The teapot is a rare antique from one of the best-known collections in London. It is of the period of the play—that of King Charles II. The testimonial is a hand-painted parchment in attractive design, and is signed by Lady Diana Manners, Alice Crawford, Haidee Wright, Flora Le Breton, Marjorie Day, Lois Sturt, Elizabeth Beerbohm, Gertrude Sterroll, Rosalie Heath, Cecil Humphreys, Gerald Lawrence, Victor McLaglan, Tom Heselwood, William Luff, Fred Wright, Lennox Pawle, Rudolph de Cordova, and other members of the cast. Mr. and Mrs. Blackton responded with an expression of gratitude at this manifestation of the esteem of their cast.

ARTISTES WHO MAKE—

In our last issue John Rodger discussed the question of artistes' publicity, and passed the opinion that artistes should never make personal public appearances. As we anticipated, these views are not allowed to pass unchallenged, and we are able to print the views of Billie Bristow the well-known publicity expert.

There is no doubt that the public makes idols in the screen world—around these favourites they weave a romance which to the person behind the scenes is not easily comprehended. Alas! what disappointments would await some of these hero or heroine worshippers if they only knew!

However, it is the wonderful mystery with which the screen players are surrounded that helps to fill the box office. The screen star is elusive—distance in this case certainly lends enchantment, but for all that, I consider, and in my experience I have proved, that the occasional personal appearance of the elusive screen star is worth while—to the exhibitor, the renter, the director, and, finally, to the star.

Such personal appearances must, however, be very occasional, and they must be so carefully arranged, and so staged, that the illusion is not destroyed. Moreover, the occasion on which the star appears must be in keeping with his or her position as a big name in the film firmament. One blunder, and the illusion disappears like a soap bubble.

The finest example of the success of public appearances I have had was when I toured a certain section of Scotland with three of our best-known British stars. No film star—either British or American—had ever made a personal appearance in this part of the country before. The result was that keen interest was aroused in the arrival of the film folk.

During our three days' stay in one big town, no less than eight public appearances were made—but each one was so arranged as to allow the public only a fleeting glance of the stars.

Once, however, I am afraid my plans fell through—that was whilst we were visiting a big factory. The employees

Kenelm Foss is now preparing the scenario and settings for his next production—the film version of the play, "The House of Peril," which will be filmed as "The Chink in the Armour."

Esme Kavanagh has been chosen to wear the medici dress at the coming Devonshire House ball. Out of a number of ladies Miss Kavanagh was chosen as having the smallest waist, being only 14 inches.

Kyrle Bellew has been prevailed upon by Sidney Jay to appear in "Tense Moments with Great Authors," a new series being started by Masters, the first being "Vanity Fair," by Thackeray. Miss Bellew will play Becky Sharpe.

—PUBLIC APPEARANCES

were so tremendously enthusiastic that, despite the manager's appeal to them to keep at their work, they simply broke loose and mobbed the stars. And such a mobbing! This destroyed for ever any doubts I might have had as to the advisability of public appearances—for it was just the audience's way of showing a wonderfully warm-hearted appreciation of their favourite stars' work.

Since those public appearances—which included a visit to a dockyard, the inspection of the fire brigades, a big public luncheon at which all the important people in the city were present, the opening of a bazaar, and two visits to cinema theatres—the names of those stars on the front of the theatres attract crowded houses, not only in the actual towns visited, but for miles around.

As I have already said, the most important thing to remember about the personal appearances of a film star is that the illusion so long cherished by an admiring public has to be carefully guarded. Let the star still remain as "ungetatable" as whilst on the screen; let no slip occur which might tend to lower the prestige of the public's idol, and the personal appearance is a complete success. These stars' admirers will become staunch friends, for they will feel they have more than the ordinary interest in them. They have actually seen him or her—they have seen the person behind the movie shadow, and know that so-and-so really exists, that they are flesh and blood, that he or she is human.

After all, the psychology of the personal appearance boils itself down to nothing more or less than the wonderful influence of the human touch—the supreme influence which can sway emotions this way or that—to love or hatred.

And it is the star, who, when the stage is properly set, can decide whether his or her personal appearance shall prove of benefit or otherwise.

A SCHEME AT LAST PLAN TO GIVE BRITISH FILMS A FAIR CHANCE

As exclusively announced in last week's Studio the most striking example of constructive reform so far achieved in the British Trade was announced by Col. A. C. Bromhead, Chairman of the I.A.K.M., last week.

His statement was, in brief, that a majority of the producers of this country had formed themselves into "The British National Film League" for the fourfold purpose of:—

Regularising the issue of British productions.

Securing a six-months' release.

Abolishing blind and block booking and Guaranteeing the exhibitor at least one British picture per week.

These aims it is proposed to secure by the combination (for the purpose of the scheme only) of the outputs of the associated producers under the title of "The British National Program" by its advertisement both to the Trade and the public as a unit, and by certain reforms in methods of Trade distribution.

The most important of these are that a

The Objects of the British National Film League are:—

To form an independent organisation for the purpose of constituting a British National Program and to encourage the production and exploitation of British Films. Manufacturers or Renters are eligible for membership, upon their subscribing to the following conditions:—

- (a) The co-operation of Producers and Renters for publicity purposes.
- (b) Each party shall guarantee to issue a given number of British-made Films during 1923, making a British Program of a total number to be decided.
- (c) The release dates for such films to be scheduled so that each subscriber to the program shall have a fixed release date for each of his films: such release dates shall be fixed in rotation and distributed over the year. An official list of dates of Trade Shows and Releases to be published by the League.
- (d) There shall be no contracts entered into with Exhibitors for the exhibition of Films in the Program until after the Trade Show.
- (e) To prevent the clashing of British features, either as to Release Dates or Trade Shows.
- (f) To reduce the present period between Trade Show and Release Date to 6 or 7 months.
- (g) The members agree that clause (d) shall apply to all the British productions they handle, whether included in the Program issued by the League or not.

six-months' release will be definitely fixed for every film in the program; that no bookings will be accepted on any subjects until after Trade show; and that each film will be booked singly. The present state of competition between the members of the League will be unaffected by the scheme; they will go out for business against one another as well as against non-members. There is no commercial fusion.

The initial year's schedule of releases has already been drawn up, the first release being set about January 1, 1923, and the corresponding Trade show in the week beginning July 3, 1922.

IS IT A SUCCESS?

After many months of arduous work, "The Glorious Adventure" is completed, and before long will be exhibited in a West End theatre by Stoll.

While Mr. Blackton has been convinced all along that the special Prizma process devised and developed for this production would prove entirely successful, the return of the developed film from the Prizma laboratories in New York has been awaited before giving out positive assurance that the epoch-marking production of a photoplay entirely in natural colours is a complete success. The significance of this will be plain. It means a great step forward in the art of the photoplay, and in the science of motion photography as well.

It means, moreover, that a new chapter in the history of the screen has been written. And aside from the colour, this film as a spectacle, is lavish and beautiful; the acting of the all-star cast, headed by Lady Diana Manners, is said to be the most impressive; and the story is compelling in its interest. From the standpoint of sets, costumes, decoration, etc., the production should be extraordinary.

Film directors for some time have realised the limitations of ordinary black and white photography. The drab effects have left much to be desired. The sense of depth and detail was lacking. There was no stereoscopic value. The effect often was dull and lifeless. This new colour process, after long and painstaking effort toward its perfection, will not only take the picture in natural colours, but will bring out even the most minor details emphatically and give a stereoscopic value not hitherto attained to every picture on the screen.

The most important need in colour photography is that the colours shall be properly massed and that the registration be perfect. This, Mr. Blackton now states positively, has been achieved, and it is an announcement of universal interest and importance.

The remarkable fact of the new colour photoplay is that on the screen the scenes have the appearance of a portrait or of painted scenes. As one view follows another, the onlooker is surprised and delighted, for here is met the great human desire for colour—a desire that is part of every-day human psychology. Close-ups of the characters are said to resemble paintings by Romney, or Rembrandt, or Sir Joshua Reynolds, and the colour effects are heightened by the extraordinary effective lighting methods used by Mr. Blackton.

For years Mr. Blackton, who was the first director to use back-lighting—and that was almost a quarter of a century ago—has used the lighting methods employed by Rembrandt in his paintings, and these stand him in very fine stead in this colour photoplay. The scenes of countryside, parks, castles, inns and interiors of the Seventeenth Century—all appear on the screen in nature's own colours, very much like painted canvases suddenly given motion.

We understand that Mr. Blackton does not intend to make any definite plans for his next British production until after the Trade reception of "The Glorious Adventure," and the probabilities are that casting will not begin until December.

YOUR CORNER

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR REPLYING TO CECIL HEPWORTH

I see by your issue dated October 29 that "Megaphone" wishes to join his protest with that of Cecil M. Hepworth in condemnation of kine operators' "frenzied projection." He says: "The effect of this frenzied projection is to distract from the quality of the production as seen by the spectators and is damaging to exhibitors, film directors and artistes."

Now, that's all very well from the point of view of the people mentioned. It is quite all right for Mr. Hepworth to protest against the operator's projection, but let me point out to him the things an operator has to contend with. In the case of "Alf's Button," a Hepworth feature, which was run at our theatre, it did not arrive at the hall until 7.35 p.m. for a 6.45 p.m. start, with the result that the operator only had time to spool the film without submitting it to the usual examination. After the "Gazette" and serial were run through, and the usual variety turn was off, there was only three-quarters of an hour left in which to run the feature. The length was approximately 7,000 ft.

So there you are; it was submitted to the usual "frenzied projection" to which Mr. Hepworth and "Megaphone" refer. As is always the case, the operator was blamed for speeding. Some old lady said she couldn't "read the reading," and then the row began!

On the other hand, if the show hadn't been over at the specified time (in time for the second house) the operator would have got it in the neck just the same. Verily, an operator's life isn't all milk and honey!

Might I mention that before getting "Alf's Button" a hunt had to be made for a substitute. This was obtained, and after working at it for about six hours, making joins here, there and everywhere, up comes the real feature, and so all that labour was lost. So you see, Mr. Hepworth, the cause of "frenzied projection" is not always the operator, for he is only controlled by the conditions that surround him. The main cause of this is the system by which the film renting establishments are run.

JOHN L. SCOTT.

Many directors perhaps are unaware of the criticisms which arise; and they might prevent minor details from being misrepresented on the screen—and possibly draw into the Kinema houses the higher classes in Society and well-to-do people, who have either scorned this form of enjoyment, or looked upon them with a suspicion that they are not quite their "style"—by employing more often persons of some social position.

The director, no doubt, knows better than the casual critic, or myself, the type of character he requires for his particular production, and there are now-a-days so many artistes, in all classes of Society, to select from, that he can have no excuse not to produce his picture in the most realistic and natural way, and to call in assistance from anyone who could give him expert advice in the making of the Picture.

The present day director is wise in his choice of Plays and Dramatised versions of Books which contain thrilling episodes, and convey something definite to the individual who studies the story and follows it carefully.

It has been remarked repeatedly, that the time of exposure of the Words on the Screen is too short, and that the Picture too disappears before they have been enabled to grasp the situation.—THOS. H. ARTHUR (Film Artiste).

REMINISCENCES OF OLD LONDON

Anyone who has watched the British industry grow cannot fail to have been impressed with the fact that the industry has been considerably affected for the good by the work of the Old London Film Company. We are therefore inviting those who were connected with the London to send in reminiscences of those good and important days. George Bellamy was the first actor to be engaged for the original company, and his article is of special interest.

I was first introduced to the "London" Film Company by Percy Nash, and appeared as Squire Chivey, in "David Garrick," under his direction; this was one of London's early efforts. Some little time elapsed, and after playing in one or two small productions, I was called to the Studio to be introduced to Harold Shaw, who had been specially engaged from America. I was selected by him to play a somewhat important part in "Clancarty."

This was followed by Mr. Shaw's wonderfully successful production of Sir Conan Doyle's "The House of Temperley." I created the part of the old gambling Earl, practically opening the film. I remember distinctly the thrill I experienced at seeing myself on the "fade-in" in the very centre of the picture (taken by the photographer, Ernie Palmer, much closer to the camera than had hitherto been attempted in any previous production I had played in), with Ben Webster and the late Charlie Rock on either side.

One morning a gentleman engaged for one of the Rough Racing Kidnappers failed to put in an appearance. After a long discussion I was asked to make-up, and see whether Mr. Shaw would approve of me in the two distinct types, as he said "doubling" was never permitted in an American studio. I successfully passed the ordeal, and always consider it was through this chance to show what is called by my friends my "versatility" that I was asked if I would like to sign on as a member of a Stock Company shortly to be selected.

Needless to say I greatly appreciated the honour, and I was the first actor to be placed on the Original London Film Stock Company, where I remained for three years; and which, in my estimation, would have been running to date, if it had not been for the Great War.

Undoubtedly it was Percy Nash's unique connection with the stage which was instrumental in bringing to the notice of the heads of the firm the whole (or practically so) of the Original Stock Company. On the completion of "The House of Temperley" the directors decided to send Mr. Nash and myself to the Principal Cities to bring more prominently before the Press and the Public the great advance that had been made in the English Studio.

It was, I understood, through Harold Shaw's recommendation that George Loane Tucker was brought over from America and from that moment successful productions were the order of the day. The friendly rivalry between these two talented Americans was the daily topic in the Studio. It was delightful to hear (as I often did) Shaw ask Tucker if he would soon be through with Mr. So-and-So, as he would like to use him in his next production, or vice-versa. The answer was invariably the same. "Sure! —George" (or "Harold," as the case may have been). The actors of the London Film Stock undoubtedly had a wonderful opportunity for gaining a tremendous amount of valuable knowledge under these two brilliant directors.

The unfortunate fire that burnt the negatives of so many of these famous films robbed many of the Company of valuable publicity, as nearly every one of these big feature films was booked and re-booked over and over again, and the St. Margaret's Factory fire practically put a complete stopper on any re-issues. I believe a few negative films were not in the Factory at the time, but their number, I understand, was infinitesimal.

Excellent work was also done by Maurice Elvey (now principal director for Stolls, the late Holmes Gore (killed in the war), Herbert Jarman (since dead), and last, but not least, Ralph Dewsbury, whom I hope to see one fine day or other, digging up the ashes and starting a New London Film Company, which I for one shall feel it an honour to be asked to join—or would it be re-join? —as a Stock Actor.—GEORGE BELLAMY.

"Master Song Scenas," Vol. 1.

B.E.F.—Master Film Production—Starring Murill Gregory, Bert Wynne, John Stuart, Joan Lockton, Zoe Palmer, Reginald Fox and Evelyn Hope—Directed by Courtenay Rowden and H. B. Parkinson—Scenario by Courtenay Rowden—Photography by Theodore Thumwood.

In the new song scenas, we have the satisfaction of seeing an English studio turn out something really novel and away from any thing yet attempted. In this respect the series marks another advance in the British motion picture industry, but when they are publicly presented they must have someone to provide musical accompaniments to them.

These are quite unlike anything yet seen, and cannot therefore be judged from the ordinary standpoint.

Each subject has been well handled by Courtenay Rowden, but H. Parkinson's production of "Home, Sweet Home," is perhaps the best of the first five subjects. We can only suggest one improvement; that is that a larger variety be dealt with. Four out of five of those we witnessed last week were sob-stuff; if the sob-stuff was alternated with comedy, then the series might prove more attractive.

We have no fault to find with the acting. John Stuart appears in two of these subjects and sustains both roles, one comedy and one dramatic, in fine style.

Another clever interpretation by Muriel Gregory, in "Eileen Allanah" and "The Village Blacksmith." In the former, she has to do a great deal of posing, in order to obtain some photographic effects, and it is to her credit, that she has done her work so excellently.

Joan Lockton has a fine opportunity in "Home Sweet Home," and gives one of her best performances in the role of the wife who runs away to London.

George Wynne displays his versatility in taking the 'heavy' part in one film, and in another the part of an honest farm labourer, trying to defend his wife from the village scandalmongers.

Zoe Palmer makes a pretty coster girl in "Sally of Our Alley," and the artiste who plays the village blacksmith, in the picture of that name, also gives a fine rendering of his part.

All the children, who appear in "The Children's Home" have been well handled by Mr. Rowden, and each gives an excellent performance.

Reginald Fox has little to do in his role of introducing the song.

Evelyn Hope is another player in the prologue. The boy who appears in this part, however, promises to be quite a good actor, if he keeps on at the rate he is now going.

There has been no attempt at getting any continuity into the subjects, but they do not need continuity, for Courtenay Rowden has evidently been more concerned—and quite rightly too—with getting the pictures to coincide with the song. Mr. Rowden's versions of the songs are excellent, except that one is apt to get a little muddled with the huge number of dreams that take place during the singing of the song, and sometimes before the song is sung. The only one that does not contain a dream is "Home Sweet Home."

Theodore Thumwood has done his work well. The photography is of a high standard throughout, some of the scenes in "Eileen Allanah" are as beautiful as anything we have yet seen on the screen. The lighting effects are a feature of the films, and the trick photography has been well done, and the beautiful backgrounds are greatly enhanced by the fine photographic work.

"The Marriage Lines."

Butchers Master Film Production—Starring Sam Livesey, Barbara Hoffe, C. Tilson-Chowne—Directed by Wilfred Noy—Photography by Theodore Thumwood—Scenario by Wilfred Noy.

A very dramatic picture, which at times comes being very near to Grand Guignol. A film that has plenty of "pep," but is the kind of film that does not redound to the credit of an English producing company. We get plenty of the melodramatic stuff from the other side, and we naturally expect something fresh from an English firm.

The moral of the story is none too good either. There are, in one house alone, two deaths in the same night, one of the deaths being a death from shock, and the other one is quite natural. Then there is a fall from a windmill, which results in another death—that is about the whole casualty list!

Wilfred Noy has had little opportunity, but he has done his work well and sustained the interest from start to finish.

Enid Gass, as the barmaid gives one of the best and most natural performances in the whole cast—her work in all the scenes is excellent.

C. Tilson-Chowne gives quite a good performance, and is well suited for the leading role, but at times he is inclined to be rather unnatural-looking and somewhat stagey.

Lewis Dayton has little opportunity, his part being to stagger about the place in a state of chronic intoxication.

Sam Livesey gives a very dramatic performance, and Arthur Walcott is very successful as the "heavy."

Barbara Hoffe, as the innocent but murderous heroine, has a great deal to do, and some very dramatic incidents are admirably done by her.

Annie Barclay is well cast.

Winifred Noy's scenario has been well written. He has worked up the dramatic climaxes in fine style, and the continuity has been excellently preserved.

Theodore Thumwood has given great care to the photography and lighting. He has secured some good effects, which greatly assist in getting some of the more dramatic scenes over.

"A Romance of Wastdale."

Stoll—Starring Milton Rosmer and Mdlle. Valia.—Directed by Maurice Elvey. Photography by Jack Cox.—Scenario by Leslie H. Gordon.

"A Romance of Wastdale" is a unique picture in many ways. Firstly, it proves that in order to get a good picture it is not always necessary to engage multitudes of people, or lavish money on sets of an elaborate and often, gaudy nature. The biggest and only crowd scene in the film contains six or seven people, all the other work is done by three artistes, the director and the cameraman.

— V A L U E S —

Maurice Elvey has cleverly handled all the mountaineering scenes, so that the whole climbing episode is one long thrill. Some really fine work on the part of the director makes the picture a sure success.

Milton Rosmer works himself up to a great height of emotional power, and portrays a very difficult part admirably. It is chiefly due to Rosmer that the histrionic section of the film is so good; it is practically a one-man picture.

Mdlle. Valia, while doing her work well, is, in our opinion, not quite suited for the part she plays. In it she has little opportunity for any really dramatic work, despite the fact that she is primarily a dramatic actress.

Fred Raynham does his work well, but is completely overshadowed by Rosmer. Still, there is no doubt about it that given the opportunity he has capacities for really fine acting.

Leslie H. Gordon has written an excellent scenario, and has worked up the dramatic climaxes in fine style. The continuity is quite good.

Jack Cox has never before equalled his photography in this picture. It is, to a great extent, due to him that the mountaineering and fight scenes have proved so good. The silhouette effects are as good as anything we have yet seen on the screen, and the exteriors are also of a very high standard.

Films like this not only add lustre to the reputation of the Stoll organisation but considerably assist the British industry in its appeal to the financial markets, and in this respect Maurice Elvey (whose work in the past varies from excellent to mediocre) has been a benefactor to the industry as a whole. His "Romance of Wastdale" is one of his best productions.

"The Imperfect Lover."

Broadwest—Starring Violet Hopson and Stewart Rome—Directed by Walter West—Photographed by A. G. Frenguelli—Art Directed by Thomas Fleetwood.

There are occasions when films have weakened their original stories. This is a case of the film strengthening its story. There is nothing exceptional in the plot; it is the variation of a plot whose variations are legion; it is thin enough to handicap the director unless he and his continuity writer are smart enough to be able to say: "Ah, here the plot thickens!"—and accordingly make it thicken.

That is the first compliment that is due to the director and his scenarist. But it is not the only one. (And it must be noted that this is one of the cases in which it is extremely difficult to separate these two contributors to the production.) Faced with the initial handicap of a well-worn, if thin, plot, the director and scenarist have done wonders in speeding up action and keeping the dramatic value of the various situations at high tension.

And in attending to the dramatics of the production Walter West has not failed to concern himself with the scenic properties. These are picturesque, and the studio sets well staged and convincing.

Violet Hopson may not be as overpoweringly successful with her role of Morcen as Stewart Rome is in his, but that is not to the discredit of Miss Hopson, who submits one of her choicest portrayals of a difficult character, but is a high compliment to Rome who, in spite of Miss Hopson's excellence, is the more convincing of the two.

A pleasingly small cast supports the two leads adequately, and combine to place the histrionic value of the production on a high plane.

Continuity has been carefully maintained; sequences good, and dramatic situations are skilfully developed.

The cameraman never fails to keep up to the high standard of quality set by the other departments of the production. His work is beyond reproach.

KINEMA CLUB NEWS

Applications for membership are still coming in, but it is necessary to emphasise the importance of those who intend to join the Club to apply NOW. By applying this week members are enrolled:
Free of entrance fee and at the special subscription fee of Three Guineas per annum. Those joining after will have to pay a steep entrance fee and an increased annual subscription.

There are, of course, a number of pessimists who say, "Oh, you'll never form a Club. It has been talked of so often." The obvious rejoinder is that the Club has already been formed, members enrolled, premises secured, and preliminary arrangements made for furnishing and equipping the extensive buildings as Club quarters ready for a Christmas opening. It is not something "in the air." It is a fait accompli. Sign the form on this page, join yourself and persuade others to do ditto.

An important meeting of the Committee was held last Monday, when it was decided "that membership be thrown open to all who are engaged in the producing side of the British Kinematograph industry under the following heads: directors, assistant directors, art directors, artistes, scenarists, scenario editors, Kine-cameramen, studio managers, casting directors, authors of filmed works, heads of studio departments, technical directors, location managers, and managing directors of producing organisations. All applications for membership to be subject to passing the Qualifications Committee."

This important extension was made in order to meet the wishes of so many reputable persons who were precluded from joining under the original terms of qualifications, and the effect will be to bring to the Club additional strength and influence. Any who come within these categories should apply without delay.

At this same meeting an expert on furnishing and club management was present, and gave invaluable assistance and advice.

It must be emphasised that the initial expenses to cover the redecoration, furnishing, and equipping the premises as up-to-date club quarters with facilities for restaurant and bar services will be very heavy indeed.

Roughly speaking, the normal running expenses will be covered by the subscriptions and the cost of staff will be met by profits on bar and restaurant. This leaves the Committee faced with the huge problem of raising sufficient funds to meet the heavy initial expenditure. For this reason it is hoped that those who are able to do so will join as life members—twenty guineas will cover full membership for life. Several private individuals and producing companies have sent along donations to the total of £182. The Committee is confident that there are many other people and companies who would gladly contribute to this special fund for getting the premises opened. The example of the gentleman who has advanced £1,000 on loan to the Club could well be followed. All communications should be addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Kinema Club, 93, Long Acre, W.C. (Phone, Gerrard 9870).

PUBLICITY FOR ARTISTES

Adrian Brunel, the popular director and scenarist, has just started a new venture, Solar Services, the principal objects of which are to provide artistes, authors, directors and others concerned in the kinematograph industry with a quick, reliable and easily accessible publicity, photographic and advisory service at the lowest possible terms.

Associated with him are Capt. Vincent Lawrence, the kinema journalist and publicity expert, who has merged his former business, the Lawrence Publicity Company, with that of the new organisation, and Nigel Freer, who is business manager of the partnership.

STOP PRESS NEWS

Owing to pressure on our space we have been compelled to hold over until next issue the second of the series of articles on "The Money Bogey," further extracts from "Dick Donovan's Diary," and the "Over the Lunch Table" feature.

Stoll was fined £2 and costs for obstructing the highway while shooting a Derby scene at Morden for "Froggy's Little Brother."

Denison Clift has finished "The Old Wives' Tale," and has arranged to commence his own productions under the title "Denison Clift Art Productions." The first of these will be the oft-debated "Mary Queen of Scots," and Fay Compton has been engaged to play the ill-fated Queen. Fuller details will be given in our next issue.

At the Three Arts Ball to be held at the Royal Albert Hall on December 8, a large gathering of artistes will be present. It is intended to make a feature of the film section, and those desiring to take part are urged to communicate with Billie Bristow, 175, Wardour Street. Particulars of a big scheme for this event will be published next week.

Application Form for Membership of the Kinema Club.

I am desirous of becoming a member of the Kinema Club and undertake to pay the agreed subscription (free of entrance fee if paid on or before Dec. 1, 1921) subject to election.

A GOOD CONSCIENCE

There must be a vast crowd of bad-conscienced folk in studioland (that is, of course, if they have consciences at all !

Nearly six months ago we gambled on the good consciences of artistes and others in the studio. And so we started the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO.

We felt convinced that the people in whose interests it was issued would support it in every way possible.

Some have.

But there are a lot who haven't.

And if you are one of the "Haven'ts" then your bad conscience ought to give you sleepless nights!

You are never backward in writing to us to assure us that the STUDIO is the paper—"fills a long-felt want"—"the paper we have waited long for," etc.—but translate these eulogies into the language of deeds.

Our last issue has brought in numerous letters of congratulations on what one director said was "the most interesting, informative and useful paper published in the film world."

But the last issue is nothing to what we have in mind—we cannot, however, develop those plans unless assured of support from you.

How are you supporting the paper that supports you? Do you occasionally buy a copy of the paper? That is all very well, but we explained last week that we do not want to exist on circulation alone (we cannot if we restrict circulation to the profession) you must advertise.

Your advertisement will be to everybody's benefit, but most of all to your own. Look at the successful folks who are advertising—they cannot afford not to.

Nor can you!

Stake your claim now and commence to get busy booking engagements.

NAMES ON SYNOPSES

Last issue of the STUDIO, under the Cameramen's section, contained some remarks made by cameramen on the way their names were missed from the reports of pictures trade shown. Here is a case something similar:

We attended a British Trade show one day last week at which no synopsis was given. The names of the artistes in the picture were shown on the screen for a few seconds, but it was impossible to get all the names down quickly enough, with the result that only about the first three were recorded by reviewers present.

After the show a very well-known film critic asked a STUDIO representative if he could supply the names of the people in the cast. So far as possible the STUDIO obliged, but some people who gave quite excellent performances were unknown to him.

The critic decided that he could not mention only a few people, without mentioning the lot, so not having time to spare in hunting round for the names he left, his parting words being, "I'll just have to give it a short mention without giving any names at all."

Such a state of affairs is hardly fair to the actors in the film, and it is doing the film itself no good. For without particulars, such as the artistes' names, etc., a critic has very little to talk about. We know the man whose remarks we quote above was impressed with the film, but his idea seemed to be if the firm did not think it worth troubling over, neither did he; and so he went away and the firm, which deserved to suffer, suffered, and the artistes, who did not deserve to suffer, suffered also. Points like these need dealing with by the artistes as a body, which at once brings up the vital question of the necessity of a Film Artistes' Federation.

Our New Service.

THE attention of all artistes, directors, scenarists and authors of screen stories is called to the announcement on page 15. In this connection, it needs to be pointed out that THE MOTION PICTURE STUDIO is the only paper in the United Kingdom devoted entirely to the interests of all those concerned in British production. But though it confines itself to this, there is no reason why its circulation and the results it produces should be insular. With the object of expanding these results and giving further service both to the producing Industry and to advertisers, we have taken the step announced elsewhere. Each week a copy will be sent to every director, studio manager, scenario chief and casting director actively engaged in the American studios; not merely those of Los Angeles, but of the whole of the United States. It should not be necessary to point out the great value of such service to advertisers, but it is essential to add that this service does not involve any charge or any increase in advertising rates. Later, as conditions on the Continent improve, this service will be extended to every reputable studio in Europe. British studio workers have never had such an opportunity of placing their announcements before the world, and it is earnestly hoped that they will seriously appreciate this expansion of service.

Reaction.

THE fact that neither the Press nor the public went crazy this time over the visit of Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks is not a sign that the popularity of these artistes has waned since a year or less ago. Neither is it the effect of Benny Zeidman's absence. It is merely that both the newspapers and the Man—and Woman—in the Street have reacted against their own violent enthusiasm. Such receptions as the two stars had last year only happen once, and the subsequent reaction is not against the recipients, but against the public's own hysteria.

A Circle of Influence.

IT is now opportune editorially to discuss the Club, which has now assumed tangible proportions. In the first place, it ought to be placed on record that the whole industry owes a debt of gratitude to the originators and the Formation Committee, which has laboured for nearly six months to bring the Club into existence. This accomplishment will have an effect which will be very far-reaching and cannot fail to benefit the industry in general and the members of the Club in particular. There are now just under 250 Foundation as an accusation, but we can also discern a compliment. Every American newspaper that is read reveals the fact that the moral standard of the American studios has slipped down several notches, until the terms "loose living" and "Los Angeles" gather to themselves a most pronounced synonymy. But the British studios have never become hot-beds of vice or cesspools of iniquity. Occasionally and with bated breath very vague rumours are circulated, but these are more fictitious than truthful. There may be very isolated cases of moral wrongdoing among film people—so there are among doctors and clergymen, lawyers and journalists—but on the whole our studios are morally clean and healthy. This is our boast.

Stage and Screencraft.

A LEGEND that has gained currency (mainly because there has been no opportunity to dispute and refute it) is that screencraft owes much to the stage. Mary Odette has conclusively proved that the stage can and does owe much to screencraft. It is common property now that Mary Odette has scored a great personal triumph in her stage part in "The Faithful Heart" at the Comedy; and the dramatic critic of the Pall Mall Gazette has said that she "is a delightful proof that the film is doing no harm to the technique of our stage . . . but, on the contrary, affording an excellent training ground." We hope that the "highbrows" of the drama will take note of this. Miss Odette exhibited very plainly that there is nothing to lose, so far as histrionics are concerned, by acquiring all the principles and philosophies of screencraft. As that keen critic, E. A. Baughan, says, "it was noticeable that not having had to act to an audience has given her a naturalness and a concentration very rare in the theatre." To those who come from the stage to the studio with an air of patronising, if not supercilious, superiority, the fact that a studio-trained actress reveals unusual stage talent must be very exasperating, as well as embarrassing.

Just to show how the difficulties of film directors are very different from play producers it is interesting to note that when Phyllis Titmuss was taken ill and Madge Stuart engaged to play in her place, it was necessary to retake several hundred feet of negative. On the stage there would be no such expense involved. Why do not film companies insure against this risk?

On behalf of all who know him I offer John East condolences on the sad loss he has suffered in the death of his wife, who had been suffering from cancer for the past three years. John is a veteran of the screen, being one of the old London players. The death of Mrs. East is a great shock to him, and in his bereavement he can be assured of the sympathy of all in the profession.

For some unaccountable reason that lying jade has been busy with the name of Welsh-Pearson, and I have the greatest pleasure in the world in being permitted to administer a very hefty knockout blow to the old dame by stating specifically that Welsh-Pearson is as safe and sound as the Bank of England. All I wish is that I had some shares in the concern

Good scenarios are still wanted.

Douglas Fairbanks is now deploring the fact that they are scarce. He says that "the amateur scenario, even where it contains a good story, is seldom practical, and the film star is therefore tempted to rely on the practised hand." So he has acquired a scenario which Sir Gilbert Parker has written and which will form the basis of a film which Fairbanks will make in England.

Everyone will agree that in a trade which deals with such inflammable stock as that handled by the picture industry, the utmost precaution should be taken to minimise all risks against fire. But few people would care to exercise the meticulous care in this respect, which is indicated in a recent decision of the Board of Film Censors. I am moved to this reflection by a communication received from Hardy stating that the Censorship Board has objected to a sub-title in "Bluff" (which has just been Trade shown) for the reason that it commences with the query, "What the Devil?" I pride myself on having quite an adequate stock of imagination, but must confess that I can see no reason for this particular stricture unless it be that the censorship authorities consider that to print on such highly inflammable material as celluloid the name of the casting director of such a production as "Hades" might set a light to the film!

ON THE FLOOR With HARLEY KNOLES

Firstly and fundamentally, he is delightfully natural while on the floor. He does not pose as the Napoleon of the studio. Nor does he obtrude his power and his position. And yet there is no semblance of a doubt as to who is the presiding genius.

He is a director who directs, in contradistinction to the director who bawls through a megaphone. The genial smile and the merry twinkle in the eye afford the sugar-coating to the pills he, at times, administers to acrimonious artistes or stupid staff.

We saw him directing Gladys Cooper and Ellen Terry this week. His methods are almost unnoticeable—that is, he does not advertise the fact that he is directing: his directions seem more casual than essential.

For close-ups of intensity he stands beside the camera and talks to the artiste; talks in a low voice that has a steady throb of feeling until the artiste realises the tragedy or the pathos of the situation involved and begins to register emotion.

His voice is seldom raised above a whisper; he is an adept at creating atmosphere in the studio. He even goes to the extent of employing a man to strike a huge bell whenever the shooting is due, at the sound of which all hammering and other noises have to cease in the studio.

On sets he is an expert and sits in judgment on all those that are erected for his production; scrutinising each very closely and having the most minute details attended to. It is this personal supervision of the small thing that spells success in the large affairs with Knoles.

sails shortly for Rio de Janeiro, where he will join the Quest. Mr. Ross has already served on two expeditions with Cherry Kearton, the big-game hunter and photographer, and with Mr. Johnstone, with whom he went on an expedition to the South Seas.

The British-American Film Producers

Alliance is now said to be ready for business, according to A. B. Carrick, who recently returned to America from an extended trip to Europe. Carrick says his company is ready to release twenty-two pictures in this country, all of which were made in England or Ireland. Two of the films were made by Carrick while he was abroad.

I was down at the Alliance studios this week and was kept gasping all the time. Mr. Marsden, the studio manager, started me off by showing me some of biggest and most elaborate sets I have yet seen. The keen attention to what some directors would regard as trivial and unnecessary detail is an index to the methods of the studio staff. Then I was astounded at the wonderful equipment of the lighting apparatus. And then the galaxy of stage stars, chatting around a table 'tween shots, and finally the perfect artistry of Ellen Terry caused me to marvel. Miss Terry is still very young in spite of her years. She has captured the Spirit of Youth, and her jokes and merry laughter kept the studio roaring. When she took the floor and submitted a wonderful emotional performance she caused us all to break into expressions of admiration. Wonderful Ellen Terry!

Hayford Hobbs writes to tell me that he has finished his contract with African Film Productions and left Johannesburg for Australia this month for the purpose of forming a company to put British films on the Australian market. He will be glad to hear from British film concerns who desire films handled by him. Letters, c/o Post Office, Melbourne, Australia, will find him.

REMINISCENCES OF OLD LONDON

Anyone who has watched the British industry grow cannot fail to have been impressed with the fact that the industry has been considerably affected for the good by the work of the Old London Film Company. We are therefore inviting those who were connected with the London to send in reminiscences of those good and important days. Douglas Munroe is in reminiscent mood:—

What a lot of happy memories come crowding into my mind when I think of the old days of the London Film Co., when I had for confreres such names as Lizzie Risdon, Christine Rayner, Gwynne Herbert, Edna Flugrath, Minna Grey, dear old Charlie Rock—now, alas, no longer with us—Jimmy Guise, Gerry Ames, Geo. Bellamy, Tony Cullin, Judd Green, Frank Stanmore, Jack East, Hubert Willis and many others. Then such good fellows as Henry Ainley, PERVERTED POETRY.

By Tony Fraser.

There was an agent named Jay,
Who saw hundreds of artistes per day;
He now makes a noise—
Is quite one of the Bhoys,
And he does seem to make his job pay.

A casting director named Billy,
In a fatherly way murmurs "Silly"
To the various screen-struck,
Who are down on their luck,
And he bundles them out willy nilly.

Fred Grove and Ben Webster used to come down to St. Margaret's for special engagements.

What times and what fun we had—and we did a lot of hard work, too, with such a master director as Geo. Loane Tucker, and Harold Shaw in charge of the film out-put. A picture a month used to be the rule from each of them. (I have completed my 110th film but more than 50 were with the London.)

I look upon the London Film Co. as the F. R. Benson Co. of film land. Look at the list of directors who have graduated at the London; Maurice Elvey, Kenelm Foss, L. B. Lestocq, Guy Newall, Frank Miller, James Rear- don are a few of the names that occur to me at the moment. I have often been playing for Shaw in the morning, then after lunch go on for a part with

Geo. Loane Tucker, and probably finish up the evening with a bit for Ralph Dewsbury or Maurice Elvey.

We had a stock company that could play anything. I should like to mention now that in my opinion in Elizabeth Risdon we had an actress who had no superior in England or America, and it was a great loss to English films when she went to the States with her husband, the late Geo. Tucker—her versatility was enormous.

We were a happy family down there by the Thames so happy that on occasions we were very rude to each other—of such is the sweet privilege of friendship!

How well we were looked after too by Pa Bending and his family at the St. Margaret's Hotel, opposite the studio—who does not remember the famous Bending lunch at which function poor Charlie Rock was wont to set the table in a roar?

I think personally if the London Film Co. could have carried on (the outbreak of war in 1914, had a great deal to do with closing down), its films would have made an even greater mark on the British film industry—even now the old beefeater sign on a picture is a thing to conjure with. I mean, when any of the London pictures are re-issued. I have heard patrons of the Kinema as far north as Aberdeen, say, "Ah, the London films are always worth seeing."

In the theatrical profession now-a-days it is wonderful in that a different light filming is regarded from what it was, say—10 years ago. For an example the other day, there was a trade show of a picture; over 75 per cent. of the cast were members of a leading Thespian club and after the performance they were discussing the merits and demerits of it. Well, it might have been the first night of a West End play they were talking about—such was the interest and keenness displayed. Ten years ago in the same club if one dared to mention he had a film job one was looked upon as a sort of Tom Bowling—"gone aloft"—in other words, not quite right in the upper storey!

THE MONEY BOGEY

While there is often complaint at the quality of British pictures, it must not be overlooked that our Producing concerns are working under the huge handicap of restricted finance. In fact, this difficulty about finance is at the bottom of the whole question, and to save the industry fresh capital must be attracted. By the courtesy of the Moving Picture World, we are able to print the views of F. W. Heathcote, of the Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank, on the way in which producing companies may receive adequate financial support from the banks. These views, when read to apply to British conditions, are very interesting as well as informative.

11.

The production of motion pictures is subject to many forms of misfortune. It should be the aim of all directors to reduce these to the lowest possible point, so that they could be covered by insurance at a reasonable figure. Among the contingencies I have in mind are the following:—

(a) Damage to outdoor scenery and sets by sudden storms.

(b) Sickness or accident to an actor or actress during the course of production, making a continuation impossible until recovery. In the event of death, the entire amount spent upon the production to date might be wasted.

(c) The discovery that defective film has been used to take an expensively-staged setting with many actors and actresses therein, which would necessitate the retake of the picture or such parts of it as were included in the defective film.

(d) The use of the wrong kind of film for certain lighting effects, with the same result as above.

A great multitude of expenses enter into the production of a large motion picture, and the opportunities for fraud and overcharge are frequently very numerous. Heretofore, sufficient attention does not appear to have been given to the obtaining of supplies in the cheapest markets, and the charges for rentals of properties have frequently been exorbitant.

As is well known, the salaries heretofore paid motion-picture stars have been unnecessarily large, and it seems to me that the same result could be obtained at less expense by exploiting the name of the director rather than the name of the star.

High salaries are often paid to motion picture actors and actresses in proportion to the extent to which their names are known to the general public, and not necessarily in proportion to their histrionic capabilities.

After devoting a good deal of thought to this subject, it seems to me that the solution will be somewhat along the following lines. Broadly speaking, there are three classes of motion pictures, namely:

(a) Small two or three-reel pictures of cheap construction to fill a very great want in small villages and in outlying parts of cities.

(b) High grade feature pictures, from five to eight reels, and shown in the great majority of theatres.

(c) Special spectacular productions costing frequently one thousand dollars or more to produce.

The last-mentioned can be left out of the discussion, inasmuch as these are very few in number, and it is very unlikely that any bank or financial concern would care to finance a picture of such magnitude.

My suggestion is that producing companies confine themselves to either one or the other of the first two classes. I think it a great mistake for one director to attempt to turn out two kinds of pictures. By a uniform class of production by a certain director and by adequate and proper publicity, the public will be trained to expect a certain type of picture when they see the director's name.

The directors should, in my opinion, form themselves into groups, each group comprising directors engaged in turning out pictures of either one or the other of the first two classes mentioned, but not both.

Each group of directors would be located in one of the large studios, each working independently, but renting his space from the studio company. Under this plan each large studio would house companies turning out the same class of picture, either cheap or high-grade pictures, as the case might be.

(Concluding article next week.)

NUMBER TWENTY-SIX

Six months ago the British motion picture producing industry achieved a new distinction—it attained the dignity of possessing its own organ. The next issue of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO will be No. 26. And we feel really proud of the fact.

When we launched No. 1, a leading director said: "I give you six weeks to live." Well, he's exactly twenty weeks out! And the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO is now far too firmly established and too popular for there to be the slightest suspicion of a doubt as to the longevity of the paper.

To celebrate the Twenty-Sixth, the next issue of the STUDIO will be a special number. The reading matter will be even more interesting than usual; the informative contents more useful. Already there has been somewhat of a run on the advertisement columns, and it is necessary for us to emphasise that in order to gain the benefit of the arrangements made for the circulation of this special issue throughout British, American and Colonial studios, it is essential that you should send advertisement copy at once. The closing date for advertisements is Wednesday next, November 30.

Artists in particular should come in our "Artistes' Cards Section," and producing companies should make announcements of their policy and forthcoming productions. Everybody should take advantage of this special issue.

Where they are and Bob Clifton is working at Stoll's.

Dave Avlott is directing a series of comedies for Parkstone.

Dawn Meredith is appearing in the new Parkstone comedies.

Violet Hopson has almost completed work in her new production.

Victor W. Rowe has completed the production of "Football Daft."

Marie Ault is playing in the new Milo film (Fryer and Rodger booking).

Lewis Willoughby plays opposite Violet Hopson in the new racing film.

C. L. Ager, the steeplejack, is doing an aerial stunt for Pathé's shortly.

A. C. Fotherington Lyson has been playing in "The Scourge" for Hardy.

Mr. Amandas is working in the new Milo film (Fryer and Rodger booking).

Eric Fane has been booked by Fryer and Rodger to play in the new Milo picture.

Enid Heather plays a leading role in the new Milo comedy (Fryer and Rodger booking).

F. W. Spalding has secured a part in the new Milo film (Fryer and Rodger booking).

Artistes and others are advised to note that the telephone number of the Ideal Studios is now Elstree 52, not 25.

Adeline Hayden Coffin has been playing in Bertram Phillips "Topsy Turvey," and is now with Violet Hopson Productions.

Barbara de Vigni has been engaged through Fryer and Rodger's Agency to play an important part in the new Milo film.

Rafael Sabatini is busy on more scenarios for Hardy. They are "The Lion's Skin," "Bardeleys, the Magnificent," and "The Reaping."

Amy Willard, who has been playing Jane Egg in "Perpetua" with Famous-Lasky, is now with the Hardy Company in "The Scourge."

Marjorie Willis is free to accept engagements, having obtained permission from the Harma Company. Her contract has not yet expired, however, and she can only be released for short periods.

Milton Rosmer, after having established a reputation for himself in English films, has now decided to return to the stage, and he will shortly be seen in "The Rattlesnake." There is no reason, however, why this should interfere with his screen work, so it is quite likely he will continue both as a screen and stage artiste.

Clive Brook is contemplating going on the stage.

Gertrude McCoy has arrived back in England.

Norman Ramsay is starting his own producing concern.

C. Tilson-Chowne has been playing Lord Saxby in "Sinister Street."

Frank Gray appears in the new Milo film (Fryer and Rodger's booking).

Madge Stuart has the leading female role in "The Scourge" (Hardy Films).

Arthur Walcott is responsible for many dark deeds in the new Violet Hopson film.

Renee Meyer has been engaged by Fryer and Rodger to play in a new stage production.

Germain Berger is chief cameraman of the Hardy Company, and is now busy on "The Scourge."

Harry Low plays a leading role with the new Parkstone films.

Ethel Oliver has been secured as leading lady in Norman Ramsay's new film.

Sidney Eaton is turning on the new Milo picture.

A PLAYWRIGHT

By the courtesy of Henry Arthur Jones, the author of many plays, some of which have been transferred to the screen, we are able to give extracts from a paper which he read at the After Dinner Club last week. Much of the paper had previously appeared in the Times in the form of an article from his pen.

It is a curious by-result of the war and the concurrent development of what is too prosaically called "the film industry," that a group of American star "movie" actresses are to-day the best known public figures in England, the most easily recognised, the most widely admired by our populace. Siddons and Rachel and our adorable Ellen Terry drew their thousands, but these new enchantresses gather their captives in sheaves of millions.

Our English film directors were cruelly disadvantaged by the war, and have scarcely yet recovered from its disabilities and restrictions. They are showing us most interesting and conscientious work. The very best that is turned out from English studios may court a comparison with the best American productions, and English pictures of English society are not the queer incredibilities so often exhibited on the American screen.

But our English firms seem at present to lack the dashing, devouring enterprise of the American directors.

Again, film acting, as distinguished from play acting, has not yet reached a high general level in England. For the most part our film actors are still on the stage rather than in the film. We have our accomplished and attractive English film actresses, whom I here salute and felicitate. But English actresses do not seem to take so naturally and incisively to the technique of the film. We may hope to see these defects and immaturities remedied as the paralysing handicap of the war is gradually lightened.

Sauntering by the House of Fame the other day, I stopped under its portico to gossip with its janitor, an imposing personage in classic robes, with whom I am proud to claim a speaking acquaintance. I asked him if the authorities within were aware of the enormous vogue of the film, and whether they had taken any steps to provide accommodation for film actors, actresses, and writers. The janitor gathered his features into a stupendous frown and became speechless.

I explained to him that as the laws of the English theatre disqualify an English dramatist for admission to the House of Fame, and that as English men of letters, by an overwhelming majority, have decided that English modern dramatists cannot enter its portals in their company, I had been nursing a hope that the faculty would take pity on our hard case and make a new consolatory rule to frank a few of us by the side door as writers of film plays.

The janitor sternly and emphatically shook his head and assured me that there was not the least chance that my application would be so much as considered. Their available space was already overcrowded, and they had grave doubts whether even some of the recipients of the new honours might not have to be turned away. They are terribly conservative in the House of Fame, a nest of obstinate Tories who have no respect for the nominations of democracies.

I accepted the rebuff of the janitor in a meek spirit. I allowed that writers of film plays were no more eligible for immortality than modern English dramatists. But I made a stand on behalf of the heroines of the picture play, and begged that a few niches might be reserved these panpopular adorabilities. I quoted to the janitor Rossetti's "Beauty like hers is genius"—a line which sometimes guides the selection of leading ladies in the theatres.

The janitor showed an impatient disinclination to continue the interview. With a magnificent classical gesture of scorn he waved me to The House of Publicity next door, and curtly advised me to address myself to the authorities there, who, he said, were enlarging their establishment to meet modern requirements.

I descended the marble steps, more than a little discouraged. The House of Publicity harbours such a very mixed company. Its occupants are so very much like the paying guests at a seaside boarding-house. None of them stays for more than a few weeks.

I have no foolish personal dignity.

I have written for the English theatre for 42 years, and this induces, nay enforces, a becoming modesty and Christian humility. But, frankly, I did not like the idea of taking up my residence in The House of Publicity.

I resented the janitor's suggestion, even more on your behalf, O queens of the film, than on my own. Why should you smirch the glittering newness of your royalty, and huddle and herd amongst the speckled ruck that jostle each other to obtain a fortnight's precarious maintenance in the jerry-built House of Publicity? Is there no higher destiny reserved for you, O universal darlings of all this populated earth?

I walked meditatively round the House of Fame. Behind its back wall I discovered an unused stretch of waste ground. Now couldn't we seize this vacant plot to put up a cosy little annexe to the House of Fame, to be rigidly reserved for approved film actors and actresses and writers of film plays? We could guard its entrance as vigilantly as are guarded the neighbouring more stately portals.

For my part, I would much rather spend eternity in your company than in the company of the selfish old curmudgeons who have taken possession of the House of Fame. And I'll wager that as soon as the old fogeys next door know that you are installed so near, some of them will get discontented with their quarters and will be sneaking round to beg admission to our circle. We won't let them in, will we?

DICK DONOVAN'S DIARY

We have secured the right to reproduce extracts from the diary of a well-known film actor, and these will be found to be interesting and illuminating comments on studio life. We have taken care to alter certain names, places and dates so that the actual events and persons cannot be identified.

Wednesday, Aug. 3: Still tramping the long, long trail from agent's office to agent's office; from studio to studio. Guess that we film artistes are in the direct line of apostolic succession to Micawber.

Monday, Aug. 8: Received a call from Blank, the agents this morning. Arrived there and found I was one of a motley mob of incompetent supers crowded into a little ante-room. Must confess I got indignant. Am not naturally "uppish" or conceited but, with five years' first-class film experience, playing leads in some of the biggest British films, I consider it an insult to class me as a possible "super." Came away and left what might have been the job of my life (and might not!).

Thursday, Aug. 11: Either I shall never be able to understand the average director or he'll never be able to understand me. Have done two days at the Ideal studios for one of the four directors working there. This man (with no world-shattering "supers" to his credit) takes the floor with the pomposity of a Napoleon, a D. W. Griffith and an Archbishop of Canterbury rolled into one. Always gives me the idea that he is expecting us all to stand to the attention as he appears. This pose he keeps up all the time. He is the Great Unapproachable. Tyrannically autocratic, and yet fate has decreed from the counsels of eternity that this man's intellect and knowledge of film producing should be reduced to the irreducible minimum! And he bullies his artistes; won't attempt to direct (in the true sense of that term) and merely blusters and blows and bellows himself black and blue in the face behind his bulky megaphone.

Friday, Aug. 19: Just been reading the press reviews of "The Blanketty Blank," the film in which I play lead. Am coming to the conclusion that critics are not men—they're a disease! Appears to me that the worst symptom of this disease is their cult of judging the public taste by their own coated tongue and bilious liver. What know they of what the public wants or don't want? How do they know, even, what the public is? No one knows. As a matter of fact these critics, to my mind, attempt to cover their lack of knowledge of the elementary principles of dramatic technique by outbursts of floriferous inanities about the psychology of the public, when all the time (in a certain sense) there is a no public and there is no psychology.

Wednesday, Aug. 31: Seem to be unlucky in stumbling across the duds in the profession. A girl at the studio was telling me of another certain director, where in order to get a part in a production she had to run the gauntlet of improper suggestions from first the studio manager, then the casting director, then the director himself. If this is true (and I believe it is), then there ought to be a great outcry. Good mind to write to the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO about it. The difficulty is that the girl would shrink from the publicity. Would write to the managing director of the company but the girl thinks he is equally guilty. This muck-business is doing infinite harm. It harms the artistes, it harms the productions, and it harms the producing industry. If a girl who is prepared to accept such overtures can be sure of an engagement then inferior talent will be screened—bad productions will result and new money be frightened off from coming into the industry.

Thursday, Sept. 1: First day in a new month. Am accordingly going to tear off a leaf from the calendar and also turn over a new leaf personally—henceforth, and for ever, I'm taking a front seat on the water-cart!

WHO'S WHERE

New Feature of Great Use

Several directors have explained to us the difficulty they have of getting quickly into touch with artistes and others whom they need for their productions, and have suggested that we publish addresses and telephone numbers of such. For the benefit of all concerned, therefore, we are commencing a "Who's Where" feature, which will be printed weekly, and will be a list of names, addresses and 'phone numbers, as the following example:—

ADAIR, MOLLY: 18, Stanlake Villas, Shepherd's Bush, London, W.2.

BELLAMY, GEORGE: 10, Culworth House, St. John's Wood, N.W.8.

CARR, CAMERON: 3, Minerva Road, Kingston-on-Thames.

DAVIS, REX: The Old Manor House, East Molesey, Surrey. 'Phone, Molesey 72.

This will provide a ready reference, and will obviously be of immense value to directors, artistes, cameramen, scenarists, art directors; in fact, to all who are engaged in British film production. The charge for this unique service is:—

Two lines, 12s. 6d. per thirteen insertions, or £2 5s. for a year, prepaid.

Extra lines, 1s. per insertion.

We intend to commence this feature immediately, and therefore it will be necessary for you to let us have your order at once. Fill in the attached particulars, and post, together with remittance, to 93, Long Acre, W.C.2.

OVER THE LUNCH TABLE

During the break in the day's work in the studio, when the director, artistes and staff gather round the lunch-table, there is usually an interchange of stories—reminiscences of humorous and thrilling happenings encountered in the course of film-making. We invite readers to contribute those stories to this column: there is no need to put them into literary form—we have a staff here for that purpose. Just send the facts.

A. E. Coleby, tells us of a recent experience when he had a big crowd up at the Stoll studio at Cricklewood, for some scenes in the screen adaptation of Brenda's story, "Froggy's Little Brother," George Ridgwell gazed with interested eyes at the motley gathering, and decided that it would suit him very well indeed for a little electioneering scene he needed for "A Lost Leader."

"So he came over to me," says Coleby, "and explained what he wanted, declared that the whole scene would take no more than fifteen minutes to rehearse and film, and—borrowed the crowd. Having taken it off into a suitable street near the studio—where it was promptly reinforced by local inhabitants—Ridgwell suddenly realised that he needed a speaker to urge upon the assembled "electors" the virtues of the Labour candidate, Lawrence Mannering (alias Robert English). So he went back to the studio and borrowed me to harangue his own crowd!"

Mr. Coleby, who has played many parts for the screen in his time, made such an excellent speech, although it was entirely impromptu, that some of the local inhabitants present imagined it was a genuine affair, and one of them audibly remarked, "D—— it all, he ought to get in!"

* * *

Ray Raymond had to grow a beard and have his hair clipped short for his part in "Repentance." The other day the company was on its way to Limehouse for some exteriors. Five well-dressed women were in the first car and Raymond, in his "tough" make-up was coming along behind, in a taxi. Arrived at Limehouse Causeway, the ladies in the front car got down into the street and then Raymond drew beside them, and was about to descend when a policeman, under the impression that Raymond had been following the five other members of the company to rob them, came up and ordered the taxi and the misjudged actor off.

COME RIGHT IN!

If you are passing, or if you want to ask a question, or if you have some news, or if you want to have a chat over the business—come right in! We are anxious to maintain close personal touch with all our readers. We are putting you first all the time—you and your interests are our chief concern, and we want to emphasise that you have a perfect right to come in and regard our time as being at your disposal. Come right in!

DESIGN IN ART-DESIGNS

by F. L. LYNDURST

I never was in agreement with the policy of playing Hamlet with a background of black velvet hangings, although a number of managers mounted plays this way. It was labelled "New Treatment," "Simplicity," "High Art," and at the same time (not advertised) it saved the expense of an elaborate plant of scenery.

Irving? Tree? Oh, yes, we know they spent fortunes on elaborate and correct mountings, but they were purely commercial. Thank goodness, the crank has not yet arrived to direct pictures with the plain background.

America places the art director next to the director. We meekly acknowledge that we are years behind them. Why? The answer is contained under many headings. As I am only concerned in art direction, I confine myself to that.

Some years ago I approached a firm which was producing on a large scale for those days. I was courteously received, but was told "We don't want an artist. You see, we paper all our scenes." Things drifted on in this fashion. With experience, the Paper Hanger attempted more ambitious schemes. He became a set-designer. The man of training who could have put composition, atmosphere and individuality into a set was frozen out.

America went through this period, but directors soon appreciated their limitations and sought the right men—the trained artist, whose business was the making of beautiful conceptions. There you have the ideal combination. The director was relieved of half his worries, leaving him clear for his duties. It is an old adage that the successful man is the one who finds the right support in his undertakings.

In a recent notice of a film shown by one of our leading firms the critic says: "The interior settings were dreadful." That paperhanger has progressed indeed!

Those sets were doubtless excellently built, decorated and furnished, but it was just a case of not showing the goods to the best advantage.

We have all found out that a good feature in the foreground gives value to our middle distance and distances. This elementary fact was years in arriving, yet the specialist, knowing his grammar, would have designed the set with this in his composition as a matter of course. The rules governing composition have to be acquired by years of study, but it is that knowledge that makes the difference between the pro. and the amateur.

I visited a studio a short time ago and was shown a most magnificent set. With pride the studio manager pointed out the solidity of it—the compo enrichments, the real mahogany doors. In fact, it was a fine set, and must have cost hundreds of pounds. The furnishing was sumptuous. Up against all this expense, at the back, through open French windows, was a terrace backed by a crudely painted back-cloth! It was important that the fact should be established that the scene took place in a Continental city. So in the centre the artist had placed a universally known landmark. The illusion was gone. No audience could be brought to think they were looking at anything but a play.

That scene was playing a part. Its furnishing I have mentioned. It was set out with mathematical exactness, but at best it was but a furnishing company's advertising stand at an exhibition. It had no sense of habitation; it never had been lived in; from the unreal back-cloth to the "real" unreal room, it failed.

Each and all of us stamp our individuality on our various abodes. We are all more or less untidy in our habits. Whatever service is available, as fast as they clear up, we proceed to undo. I have never seen these intimate notes applied in the final dressing of a set.

I have laboured the point of settings, it being a large subject, but it is the detail work that really tells, giving the polish and finish that goes to make the super. This the paperhanger will never be able to give.

Apart from getting my living in the business, I am keenly anxious for the betterment of our productions. Unless great strides are made in the near future, all the talk in the world will not put us level in competition with other countries unless we can hand out the goods. If we can produce the right pictures, America will buy them.

MEASURING UP THE

"Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush."

F.P.-Lasky—Starring Donald Crisp and Mary Glynne—Supports: Alec Fraser, Dorothy Fane, John East, Langhorne Burton, Jerrold Robertshaw, Mrs. Hayden Coffin, Humberstone Wright, Roy Rich, Joan St. Low, W. Parry, Jeff Barlow, J. Dawson, Tom Coventry and Booth Conway—Directed by Donald Crisp—Assistant Director: Claude H. Mitchell—Scenario by Margaret Turnbull.

Good direction, gifted cast and excellent staging are here wasted on a poor story. This story spoils what would have been a really first-rate production.

In this production Donald Crisp has his best British picture. It gives full evidence of his artistry as a director, but he has blundered in using Scriptural sub-titles too frequently.

Margaret Turnbull has made a good working continuity from a poor film story.

Crisp filled the dual rôle of director and star, and as the latter he is head and shoulders above all else in a noteworthy cast.

Mary Glynne is not the best of the feminine section of the cast by any means; Dorothy Fane is convincing and more natural.

John East makes an excellent Posty and lives the part rather than acts it.

Alec Fraser has to support a very difficult part, but comes through with flying colours.

Technical properties are up to the usual F.P.-Lasky standard, and photography is excellent.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Very good.
LEADS: Crisp and Alec Fraser are quite good.
SUPPORTS: Quite adequate.
LITERARY: Story poor; continuity good.
PHOTOGRAPHY: Good throughout.
LIGHTING: Very good.
EXTERIORS: Aptly chosen and picturesque.
INTERIORS: Beautiful sets.

"Our Aggie."

Milo Films—Starring Mary Patterson, Bert Darley and Jack Jarman—Directed by Jack Denton—Scenario by Jack Denton—Photographed by Sidney Eaton.
This is neither as good nor as bad as it might have been. Perhaps its defects are due to the natural indiscretions of youth, for it is the first production of this new company. But we must say, in the candidness of kindness, that Milo must offer better productions than this if it hopes ever to reach maturity.

As the scenario and the direction are both the responsibility of the same man, it is easy to see that Jack Denton has not failed to do the best he possibly could with the material at his disposal. There is a limited story value attached to the production, and this has been carefully exploited to the full. The music-hall scenes have been well staged, and the crowd skilfully handled. There should have been no break in the closing scene in the artistes' dressing-room—the sub-title is superfluous as well as inopportune.

With more experience and the training that experience affords, Mary Patterson should make quite a commendable screen actress. In this picture she is only suggestive of potential talent.

Bert Darley has not as prominent a part as his abilities merit, but there is no mistaking his capacity for humorous screen work.

Jack Jarman is quite good as the sailor, and invests his part with the atmosphere of the character.

Sydney Eaton's reputation justifies us in assuming that the photography is of a good quality, but the negative appears to have lost merit in the printing.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Good.
LEADS: Males good.
SUPPORTS: Fair.
LITERARY: Story fair, continuity good.
PHOTOGRAPHY: Good; printing faulty.
LIGHTING: Good.
EXTERIORS: Suitable.
INTERIORS: Convincing.

that has been screened to a Trade audience this year. It cannot fail to do immense good to the British production industry, and as such is true propaganda. All who have had any hand in the production stand complimented on their work and congratulated on its results.

Secretly, we have often felt that Geoffrey Malins had it in him to make highest-grade motion pictures if he were only given a chance. He has justified these prognostications in "Bluff." This production evidences much more than average skill in direction by reason of the numerous and very necessary flash-backs. "Bluff," in a word, has presented a great challenge to Malins, which challenge has been accepted with great credit. He has handled the intrigue aspect with the skill of a consummate artist.

In this connection, it is worthy of note that Malins has been genius enough to co-operate with the author in the production. Rafael Sabatini evidently possesses that rare mentality that combines the ability to think both in words and in pictures.

The high quality of "Bluff" is a complete vindication of the policy of allowing the author to collaborate with the director in the studio.

A cast of exceptional ability conspire to set the histrionic aspect on a high level. Lewis Willoughby adds to his Anglo-American laurels by his artistry and by his complete mastery of the art of make-up.

Lawrence Anderson plays heavy convincingly and powerfully; while Marjorie Hume invests her part with her own charming screen personality plus considerable histrionic ability. Harding Steerman plays with his usual dignity and restraint.

Mme. d'Esterre makes a verily convincing Mrs. Graham.

Sidney Paxton submits a polished performance, and Guy Graham gives a pleasing portrayal.

Youthful Germain Burger has achieved a personal triumph with his camera work. This is never harsh, but invariably picturesque (in the photographic sense). His control of the lighting properties is very clever indeed, especially in the night scenes.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Very good indeed.

LEADS: All three of high merit.

SUPPORTS: Admirably cast and excellently played.

LITERARY: Story very strong; continuity never confused.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Perfect.

LIGHTING: Excellent.

EXTERIORS: Well chosen.

INTERIORS: Realistic and well staged.

"Moth and Rust."

Butcher—Progress Production—Starring Malvina Longfellow, Sybil Thorndike, George Bellamy, Langhorne Burton and Cyril Raymond—Directed by Sidney Morgan.

Out of Mary Cholmondeley's novel Sidney Morgan has made a good production. Some of the scenes are inclined to be morbid, but the plot has been well worked up, and the film is greatly enhanced by the acting and photography.

Malvina Longfellow gives a fine portrayal of the central figure, Janet. She has good emotional power and uses it well.

Sybil Thorndike is good in her part, but it is a very tragic one.

Langhorne Burton has quite an easy role, and fills it excellently.

George Bellamy plays the part of a cold, hard moneylender, and does his work admirably.

Cyril Raymond is another artiste who gives a good performance.

The scenarist has used too many subtitles at the beginning of the film to explain the various situations, but these titles are, perhaps, necessary. The continuity is good, for each event follows the other in a straightforward manner, despite the intricacy of the plot. All through the film it is unrelieved gloom and tragedy.

The cameraman has done well, and has secured some fine quality. His work is pleasing throughout.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Good.

LEADS: Good.

SUPPORTS: Good.

LITERARY: Story a little too gloomy.

CONTINUITY: Excellent.

TRADE SHOW GUIDE

Where and When to See your Film

The profession awaits with great interest the first showing of A. E. Coleby's new Stoll film,

"FROGGY'S LITTLE BROTHER."

This is Coleby's first production, away from Davidson's, for a good number of years, and it should be interesting to see how he manages with the new equipment at his disposal. TRADE SHOW: Tuesday, November 29, at the Alhambra, at 3 p.m.

Another Trade show of interest is the Progress film, which Butchers is showing. Fred Groves, Mavis Clare, Pauline Peters and Warwick Ward are mentioned in the cast. The story is directed and adapted by Sidney Morgan.

"THE MAYOR OF CASTERBRIDGE,"

TRADE SHOW: Wednesday, November 30, at the New Gallery, at 11 a.m.

A MILESTONE PASSED

by J. STUART BLACKTON.

As I look back over the years that mark the history of the photo-play I can think of nothing that strikes me as of such supreme importance as the final perfection of the process by which rapid movement and dramatic action may be photographed in natural colours.

Great strides there have been in lighting and all avenues of scientific and artistic improvement of screen standards, but from the standpoint of the public I cannot help feeling that the most important step forward yet made is the perfection of the colour process by which my first British production has been photographed by Prizma. This most remarkable method of colour photography—invented by William Van Dorn Kelly, of the Prizma Company—has been a revelation to me, and to say that I am delighted with the results, expresses my feelings but mildly. I feel indeed that a great milestone in the progress of the photo-play art has been reached and safely passed.

It has been the hope of the earnest workers for the uplifting of the screen art for some years to attain colour in the photo-play. Many attempts have been made, and in every case there has been failure. Colour was needed to give life and spirit and reality to scenes on the screen, to provide depth and bring out detail. Then there is the ever-present human desire for colour.

Some weeks ago I wrote in this paper of the deficiencies of black-and-white photography on the screen. I then stated that the greatest drawback of the film art up to the present had been its drab monotone, leaving much to be desired because of the lack of life in the pictures and also in the lack of stereoscopic values.

I can now state that since that was written my colour production has been completed, and the colour process is an absolute success. Instead of drab monotone, we have the life, richness and variety of nature's own colours. We have the sense of reality that springs from not merely the colour, but the depth and stereoscopic values. Seeing these scenes on the screen is like watching some such stage production as Oscar Asche's "Cairo," with all its pictorial lure.

The difference between natural-colour photography and the black and white may be likened to the transformation of a grey landscape on a dull day to the same scene sparkling and luminous when flushed with glorious sunshine. I believe that natural colour photography carries cinematography much nearer to a stage of perfection.

My belief in the importance and significance of this first colour photo-play is justified by the great public interest in the production; and when I say "public interest," I mean by artistes, photographers, scientists and learned people interested in the art of the photo-play, as well as by the play-going public. In Europe and in America, publications devoted to the arts and sciences have shown great interest in the results of this first attempt to make a photo-play in natural colours, and the news of the success of the venture has been hailed with gratification.

The British Journal of Photography has on two occasions printed articles on this production, emphasising the importance they place on the success of this photo-play in natural colours.

Conquest, the British Magazine of popular science, recently printed an extensive illustrated article on "The Glorious Adventure," which I regard as a highly important recognition of the scientific and artistic value of this photo-play. This article goes into detail in describing the scientific aspects of this new photographic method. It says in part:

"The quest of the coloured motion-picture has long been one of the most fascinating problems of cinematography. Many attempts have been made and hundreds of patents granted for various inventions in this field, but only recently has success been attained. . . . The first big film to be produced in natural colour by the Prizma process is now nearing completion in a big London studio, under the direction of J. Stuart Blackton, while the special Prizma camera being used is in charge of William T. Crespinal. Already the results are stated to have far exceeded all expectations. Every dress, every piece of tapestry and every colour in the gorgeous sets is said to be seen on the screen exactly as viewed by the eye in the studio. Moreover, the reproduction of nature's own colours on the screen has given to the film a resemblance to stereoscopic depth entirely lacking in the old black-and-white pictures. It remains for the future to show what this invention really means for the screen. That it has already opened out entirely new possibilities in screen art is certain. Whether or not it will completely oust the black-and-white film only time will show."

There has been some discussion as to whether the ordinary projection machine would effectively show this colour film on the screen, and suggestions have been advanced that a special machine should be required for projection. I want to state as emphatically as possible that this is incorrect. This film can be shown in any theatre, and the usual projection machine will throw it effectively on the screen. It is, therefore, as commercially practical as it is artistically attractive.

I am highly pleased with every phase of the production, and I hail this new step in photo-play production as a real milestone in the progress of the art of the screen.

Film Censorship.

MORE and more attention is being paid to the present position of film censorship in this country. Harassed by the continual interference of local authorities, and by the fact that the decisions of the Board of Censors are not legally enforceable, exhibitors in several provincial centres have expressed themselves in favour of State control. Public opinion, however, is undoubtedly against it, and it is doubtful whether the authorities themselves look kindly on the idea. In fact, it has recently been stated in the House of Commons that the Home Office is satisfied with the censorship of the British Board.

But the existing difficulty is that, in spite of the Board's decisions, local authorities have the power to prohibit the showing of the film that has been passed and to permit the showing of a film that has not received a certificate. Part of this anomaly has been removed by some licensing committees who made it a condition of a licence that only films passed by the British Board shall be shown, and something was done by the Exhibitors' and the Renters' Societies towards agreeing that their members would only show or distribute films which the Board had passed.

Tighten Up!

THIS agreement, however, has not entirely been adhered to. At any rate, films have been Trade shown before having been submitted to the Board and have been booked on their Trade show, afterwards being censored and cut and consequently not delivered to the exhibitor as originally shown. To the general question of censorship of films the L.C.C. has been paying much attention, and it appears likely that it will insist on a licensing condition that only films passed by the Board shall be shown. If it does so, its example is likely to be followed by most, if not all, provincial licensing authorities which have not already adopted such a condition. But here again it may be that there would be a loophole, in that it might still be possible to show a film, which had not been passed by the Board, if the permission of the L.C.C. were obtained. It may be argued that this would mean little, as any film which the Board did not pass would not be fit for public exhibition. This is not so, for the Board will not examine "propaganda" films—and in this category come films which are ostensibly made for educational or hygienic reasons, but actually rely, for the attraction of audiences, on their prurency. It also covers films which contain social and political than any other of the type which the film Industry has attempted to rear. We do not want to speak any evil of the dead, but we cannot help remembering other schemes which have never got beyond the stage of conception. Of course, the Kinema Club is not yet out of the wood, but it has already a large membership, staunch and influential supporters (one of its latest additions to its Committee has been Maurice Elvey), many hard workers—and, by no means the least important factor, its premises. All the work so far has been done by a handful of people—artistes, directors, cameramen and journalists—who have devoted most of their meagre leisure to its development. What it most needs now is, first more members and secondly more money. All the spade work has been done for YOUR sake—the collective you who represent the producing Industry. Now what are YOU going to do in return to help it to start out in the world?

Lower Salaries.

THE influx of foreign films and the bad conditions in overseas markets, added to the general depression, cause a great deal of retrenchment in American studios. Its greatest effect has been the immense cut in salaries of artistes and directors, and while one may have a certain amount of sympathy for the people who are now getting less, it is hardly possible to have much for the grotesquely overpaid star and director who have now been brought to earth. Star and director stealing, frenzied finance and antagonism between producing organisations has been mainly responsible for these inflated salaries, and they have been bad for the Industry as a whole because they have driven the cost of production up to a point far out of proportion to its intrinsic value. It is stated that directors who were formerly getting a thousand dollars a week are now only able to command three hundred, and artistes a proportionate rate!

A Final meeting of the Committee is called for Monday, December 5, at 7.30, at 93, Long Acre.

propaganda. Possibly licensing authorities might consider that some of these films ought to be shown in the public interest and possibly in some cases they might be influenced by political motives. The same muddled situation as now exists would then arise. Nothing but a tight and unconditional refusal to prohibit the exhibition of any films passed by the Board will even partially solve the problem. The alternative is State Censorship, with all its disadvantages, dangers and restrictions.

Your Turn to Act.

IT is with a certain amount of pride that we have watched the development of the Kinema Club to its present stage. Born to some extent, of this paper, the idea has grown up sturdily and it is at present a far more promising infant

Intimate Studio Gossip

What a week we have had. Mary Pickford said she wanted to see a real London fog. I hope she's satisfied. I wonder how they managed at Islington with their fog-fighting device? What I do know is that if the Club had been open it would have done a roaring trade. However, the Industry cannot afford any more of these fog-bound weeks.

Talk about "Dick Donovan's Diary"—here is a short diary of another artiste who called to see me last week:—November 1: Sent for and engaged to play ("Wait and Hope"). November 10: Postcard: "Go to Gustav for wig." November 12: Get wardrobe. November 30: Called to studio, wait four hours, play at 5.30 and then, "You're finished." December 1: Met friend, and his comment was, "You're always grumbling and yet you get £5 a day—I don't know what you do with your money."—(Collapse of artiste.)

Another actual occurrence:—Director visiting a certain agent: "I want a man to play Uriah Heap can you—" "Uriah Heap!" exclaimed the agent, "I've got the very man—the very man . . . just wait half a second," and he rushes from the office to the room below. "Say, boys," he bellows, "who was Uriah Heap?"

Arthur Rooke has a funny taste in hobbies—he amuses himself with an aviary of 400 rare birds. His other pets include a tame owl, which appears in his films, a terrier dog, a talking parrot and several stray cats! And yet he is called "the silent director."

Some significance can be attached to the arrival in this country of Wyndham Standing, the big American film star, who became famous as the ghost in "Earthbound." He arrived at Liverpool last Monday, and I can claim the honour of being the first Press man to chat to him. Naturally he had something to say about the fog, and from fog the talk turned to lighting. Mr. Standing thinks that the daylight studio is a thing of the past; in America such a thing is never seen nowadays. All the huge glass buildings have been darkened and only artificial light is used. The advantages of artificial light are obvious; it is like taking the sun and putting it wherever you like. More effects can be obtained and work can be done any day of the year. Things in America, according to Mr. Standing, are none too good. There are many foreign films, but the tariff has not become popular with American exhibitors.

To my mind, one of the faults that our directors may possibly be accused of, is that of straining after locations and picturesque exteriors instead of developing characterisation in their productions. It may be that our wonderful scenery is too potent a temptation, but I sometimes think that this neglect of characterisation may explain some of the failures of filmed novels. Be that as it may, the fact remains that there is a tendency (and I think "The Bigamist" is a good example) for pictures to lose their balance of story and—setting. Story must come first; if scenery overshadows a story then the result may be a super-scenic, certainly not a photo-drama.

An interesting event in the profession has recently taken place. Herbert Wilcox, of Astra Films, has just announced that he has been made managing director of the Associated Exhibitors Company. This company has been at work for a number of weeks, although very little has been heard of it. It acquired the stock company, studios and equipment of the Harma Company at Lime Grove. The

ON THE FLOOR With GEO. A. BERANGER

George A. Beranger is not an American, although he has spent ten years of his life in America directing pictures. Seven of these years were spent as assistant to D. W. Griffith. With such a training one naturally looks forward to seeing something good when his first English picture, "Sinister Street," is shown.

His work at the present time is something of an adventure to him, for it is the first picture he has directed outside an American studio, and he is putting all his energy into it to make a name for himself in England.

Long before he takes the floor he has every scene visualised, every set designed, each of the characters minutely described and their costumes designed. Many sleepless nights he spends on making his preparations.

On the floor he is quiet; and, what amazes most artistes, is remarkably democratic. He works slowly, but surely—never spoiling a scene simply because he is in a hurry to finish it.

Send Christmas Greetings

stock company consists of Marjorie Villis, James Knight, Constance Worth and Bernard Dudley. The first two productions are now completed and are to be Trade shown within a month's time. "Love in the Hills" is Bernard Dudley's production, and features James Knight and Marjorie Villis. Einar J. Bruun is responsible for the direction of "The Corner Man," the company's other production, which features Hugh E. Wright and Ida Lambert. A definite announcement has not yet been made, but rumour has it that the company's next film will be a very big one, a screen version of a well-known play, and will feature a certain big theatrical star.

Living in the heart of filmdom as we have to we are interested in the sturdy new weekly paper, The Soho Gazette, which has made its appearance. In the latest issue are references to the exclusive character of our Club, and the writer draws on history to prove that it is possible to be too exclusive:—"Dr. Johnson wanted to limit membership of the Literary Club, founded at the 'Turk's Head' in Gerrard Street, in 1764, to Dr. Johnson and the people of whom Dr. Johnson approved. When David Garrick was proposed as a member, the doctor said: 'Sir, he would disturb us by his buffoonery.'" But our Club has got Johnson beaten to a frazzle!

Referring to my suggestion last week to the effect that, in view of the great expense involved by the sudden illness of artistes, producing concerns should insure against this risk, T. B. Lestocq writes me to explain that at F. P.-Lasky's Islington studios it has been a rule for some time to insure the director and principal artistes against any accident or illness that may occur during production. He says: "Only recently one of our leading artistes met with a bad accident and was laid up for some considerable time, and had we not already had him covered by insurance it would have cost us a considerable sum of money for the delay occasioned by the accident." I also learn that Walter Forde, our comedian, has insured his life for £25,000. If he goes on like that he will soon be worth "MEGAPHONE." alive.

A MODEL

by A HARDY

The Hardy Film Company is quite youthful having been born in the early part of this year, therefore it pleased me much to accept a part in "The Scourge" by Rafael Sabatini, now being shot at the studio at Worton Hall. The following notes on men and matters I made whilst down there.

Genial Sam Hardy, managing director, liked by all, has a pleasing personality, and is a shrewd, firm, businesslike man. His energy permeates the company. Often at the studio as early as 8.30 a.m., then back to the London Office for the remainder of the day, he has but one idea in his mind—success.

Each film studio carries an atmosphere, largely built up from the vibrations emanating from the dominant figure controlling the studio—in this case, Geoffrey Malins, O.B.E., the "hypnotic director." Malins is on his third Hardy picture, all of which have been written for the screen by Rafael Sabatini from his own books.

Malin's energy dominates the studio, and is absorbed by all. He keeps his finger firmly on its working pulse, nothing escapes his keen observant eye. He designs all his scenery and personally superintends the work connected with the same, down to the smallest detail. He is a quiet worker, kind and courteous in all his dealings, both with artistes and staff. The former find him refreshingly different from the average director, no shouting and swearing if mistakes are made, explanations are given individ-

(With Apologies to Rudyard Kipling)

by MAX FREEMAN

WHEN you can "hold" your smile while all about you
Are frowning hard and criticising you;
When you can trust yourself—though others doubt you—
To think your dreams of fame are coming true;
When you can wait, and not be tired of waiting
On groaning floors, or up the creaking stairs;
And try to think you love the job you're hating—
That others like your chances more than theirs;

WHEN you you can dream of Lasky, Stoll, or Masters, Sending a car to take you to your part
As Hero brave in triumphs and disasters,
For big fat cheques—and not wake with a start;
When you can scorn the horrid truth that's muttered,
That there are knaves, but you're among the fools,
And just ignore the sound advice that's uttered:
"Quit shadows, and for substance take to tools";

WHEN you can act with "crowds" and keep your virtue,
And play with Mary, Doug., or great as such;
When Agents and Directors cannot hurt you,
When they all count on you—but not too much;
When you can make Directors "wait a minute."
Convinced you're really greater than you are;
The Studio's yours, and everything that's in it,
And—what is more, my son—you'll be a STAR.

Stewart Reme is now playing the title rôle in "Dicky Monteith," which Kenelm Foss is directing.

John Stewart has been engaged by George Beranger to create the hero part of Michael Fane in "Sinister Street" (Ideal).

Bertie Wright, brother of Fred Wright, is playing in "The Little Brother of God" (Stoll).

Molly Adair is playing Sylvia Scarlett in "Sinister Street," which George Beranger is directing for Ideal.

Lewis Gilbert is playing Captain Tovernay in "The Truants," which Sinclair Hill is directing for Stoll.

George K. Arthur (it is now announced for the first time) played in "The Lamp in the Desert" for Stoll.

Evelyn Brent is now playing the title-rôle in "The Spanish Jade" for F.P.-Lasky, and is now at Seville, in Spain.

Fred Wright is figuring in "The Norwood Builder," an episode in the Sherlock Holmes series which George Ridgewell is directing for Stoll.

Ward McAllister is playing hero in "Repentance." He has played heavy lead in the longest serial film (60 reels) ever produced, with Lottie Pickford (Mary's sister), and worked in the very first five-reeler, "Cymbeline," produced by Thomas Hefforan for Thannhauser eleven years ago.

ually in a low tone, making it a real pleasure to work for him.

Malins is a master in the study of humanity, and manipulates the keys accordingly, bringing just what he wants into being—a human artist; a reader of souls. He is moreover, what every director should be—a refined educated gentleman, understanding the true meaning of comradeship.

Donald Lindley is the Hardy studio manager, and a director of the Company. Speaking for the artistes, we are all grateful for his efforts to make us as comfortable as circumstances permit, in Samuelson's derelict "dug-outs," called dressing-rooms. He tells me these are to be renovated and brought up to date shortly, and I hear rumours of a green room, where artistes can wait their calls in comfort.

We come very little into personal touch with the Cameraman except through the camera. Germain Burger, a clever son of a clever father, is the youngest in his line in the kinema trade. The knowledge of his art is profound, and for one so young (he only looks 15, but claims 21,) is somewhat uncanny. It speaks well for his business acumen, that he is a director of the Company. At his present rate of progress, he ought to make a great name for himself.

A Caton Woodville, son of the celebrated artist, is Hardy's art director—an excellent choice. He is responsible for correctness in period and detail for all costume films.

REMINISCENCES OF THE OLD LONDON

Anyone who has watched the British industry grow cannot fail to have been impressed with the fact that the industry has been considerably affected for the good by the work of the Old London Film Company. We are therefore inviting those who were connected with the London to send in reminiscences of those good and important days. T. B. Lestocq is in reminiscent mood:—

I believe I can claim to be one of the earliest employees of the London Film Company, as I joined the staff under Percy Nash at the time when he was engaged in converting the Roller Skating Rink at St. Margaret's into the plant which for years upheld the enviable reputation as England's premier moving picture studio.

I was with the Company for six years, and during that period I can truly say that I served my apprenticeship in practically every branch of the game. My experience was in many ways unique.

For my early insight of kinema photography I have to thank that well-known veteran of the film industry, H. M. Lomas. I owe the technical knowledge I obtained of the directors' angle to Percy Nash and George Loane Tucker. I was Mr. Tucker's first assistant in this country, and I worked under him for many pictures. A comparison between present-day studio organisation and that of the old London film epoch is very interesting.

Percy Nash directed the London's first picture, "David Garrick," with a fine cast headed by Gerald Lawrence, Frank Stanmore, George Bellamy, Wyndham Guise and Mary Dibley; then Harold Shaw arrived from America and was responsible for our first big picture "The House of Temperley."

The great fight scene was shot on Epsom Downs, and I am not likely ever to forget the journey from Waterloo to Epsom. On this occasion I had been assigned the rôle of second cameraman, and had deposited myself and my paraphernalia in a carriage in company with Rex Davis and his ring opponent.

Soon after the train left Waterloo, both these exponents of the noble art removed their coats and proceeded to rehearse their fight. Needless to say, I soon found myself very much in the way, and, after dodging from one seat to the other and making various futile attempts to mount the rack, I was decidedly relieved when we finally reached Epsom none the worse for the encounter.

Many of to-day's British screen stars undoubtedly owe much to the London Film Company. Some made their début under the régime of the well-known Beefeater Sign, whilst others added considerably to their then early experiences as film artistes. A few names might bring back pleasant recollections to readers and old London filmites—Sir Herbert Tree, Henry Ainley, Albert Chevalier, Ben Webster, Henry Edwards, Gerald Ames, Douglas Munro, Hayford Hobbs, Wyndham Guise, Hubert Willis, Charles Rock, Arthur Cullin, Gwynne Herbert, Frank Stanmore, George Bellamy, Kenelm Foss, Judd Green, Minna Grey, Manora Thew—some of these and many more obtained their first screen engagements through me, and it is very gratifying to look round to-day and see names featured of many who were only crowd or small-part people in those days.

It is not only artistes who have to thank the London Film Company for their kick-off and their present position in the business. One should look behind the scenes and cast one's eyes over directors, cameramen, assistant directors, etc., many of whom got their chance then and have gone forward ever since.

Undoubtedly, from the time that "The House of Temperley" was made, British productions went rapidly forward; in fact, I think I am safe in asserting that the London Film Company revolutionised the entire British industry by raising the standard and setting a tempo with which others were obliged to keep pace, if they wished to exist.

We did away with "corner shots" and ballroom scenes represented by a palm and two flats. We only used canvas for backcloths and built our sets entirely of wood. Naturally, not having unlimited capital at our disposal, we were forced to economise to a certain degree. We had our "stock sets"—three in oak panelling—which could be utilised again and again with different doors, pictures and hanging to lend variety.

Our stock company consisted of about eleven people. These artistes received anything up to £20 a week. Star parts, for which a famous actor was recruited from the "legitimate" stage, were paid at the rate of £5 to £7 a day. Individual costuming was placed in the hands of a theatrical costumier, and was carried out under my personal supervision.

A big production would never run us into more than £3,000, in those days a record sum to spend on a single picture. The firm, however, expended some £20,000 on experimental work, securing the services of Sir Herbert Tree, who gave several excerpts from his most successful plays, such as "Trilby" and "Henry VIII." at the St. Margaret's Studio.

As none of these super-film episodes were ever used for public release, the Company never covered their initial outlay, but learnt much in the matter of lighting, photography and effective grouping. It was research work pure and simple, an education for which they were not afraid to pay a good price, knowing that the results would show themselves soon in better British pictures.

Of course, there were all sorts of amusing happenings in those early pioneering days. I remember Tucker requisitioned a white rat for one of his pictures, which for some reason or other got hung up, so that by the time the original rodent was required it had multiplied exceedingly and departed this life. Then there was another hold-up till one of its offspring had attained the necessary dimensions for it to take over the part originally designed for its parent.

Then there was a "Great Fire." It broke out in the house next door, and the entire studio fire brigade turned out en masse to help extinguish the flames. With true American enterprise, George Loane Tucker hurried a few of his artistes to the scene of activities and took advantage of the opportunity to shoot some "fire stuff," just against the emergency turning up of his requiring that sort of thing.

Hardly had the blaze been successfully subdued, than our own fire alarm charged through the studio. As our fire specialists had not returned from the other conflagration, and we were short of the necessary apparatus, there was something of a panic, till we discovered the cause of the alarm—our youngest office-boy, so deeply absorbed in the adventures of Sherlock Holmes, that he was blissfully unaware that he was propped up against the electric button of the fire alarm!

The end of the London came in sight with the outbreak of the war. The Company

FRONT COVER BIOGRAPHIES XV—VIOLET HOPSON

Violet Hopson was born in California, U.S.A. She was brought to England by her parents when quite small, and was educated in a French convent. On leaving school she joined a musical comedy touring company, rose to leading parts, and afterwards appeared at Daly's Theatre. Owing to a breakdown she was obliged to give up her stage career, and upon the persuasion of a friend, she accepted a small part in a film then being made.

After having played small parts for eighteen months, she appeared in a leading rôle. Soon afterwards she was engaged by Walter West to play the leading part opposite Matheson Lang in "The Ware Case." From that moment she has never looked back. Steadily she has forged her way ahead until she now stands in the front rank of the world's screen actresses.

Amongst her most notable successes whilst she was with the Broadwest Company were "A Soul's Crucifixion," "A Gamble for Love," "Snow in the Desert," "A Daughter of Eve," "A Fortune at Stake," "A Sportsman's Wife," and more recently "Vi, or Smith's Alley," and "The Imperfect Lover."

Miss Hopson has also placed several films on the market under her own company. Two of these films are racing films, for of the sporting heroine, (in which part she shines) Miss Hopson has made a speciality. "The Gentleman Rider" was her first film, which was a huge success, and her second, adapted from the well-known poem, is "Kissing Cup's Race," which is to be rehearsed shortly.

There is little doubt that Miss Hopson is the best known, and one of the most popular of our British artistes, and is equally well-known both in the Colonies and abroad. Under the direction of Walter West, she has achieved a position in the British film world which is supreme.

willingly gave its best, and left itself with such a depleted staff that it was found impossible to carry on, a blow from which the firm never recovered.

Everybody who has had any connection with this famous firm will look back with pride on their past associations. We all felt the closing down of the studio, not only as a personal loss, but one which the British industry could ill afford to sustain. However, its memory will always live in the work of the many fine artistes who received their first apprenticeship under its banner, and who are still carrying on its great traditions.—T. B. LESTOCQ.

CAUSE AND EFFECT

To the Editor MOTION PICTURE STUDIO.

SIR,—Common fairness demands that I should whisper to you of the valuable publicity resulting from the inclusion of my photograph, for two weeks only, in your Artistes' Picture Gallery. No longer am I greeted by the "who-the-devil-is-this?" look on the faces of agents and directors. No longer do I have to watch the agent's painful effort to be polite as he wades desperately in a sea of vaguely familiar faces (screen-struck and otherwise) towards the "filmy" goal of identification. Once in the Studio Gallery, I now seem to be known far and wide—for good or ill!

Directors and agents greet me with an intimate and welcome nod—or hurried "fade out" (in less than ten turns), as the case may be. Fellow artistes instinctively make way, realising their "limits" in the presence of one who has got "close up." I find myself in the "crowd," though not of it. There is no need to "make up" for a "long shot" at the agent. I simply "fade in" to the centre of the picture, giving my hat to the office-boy with a brief "Hold it." I am "covered" against any risk of bad "manners" being in the way that "leads" to the "star"!

Oh, Sir, it would never do to make all this public, or we should never be able to see the STUDIO for pictures. This is merely a "synopsis" for your own "view," as I wish to avoid a "scene."

Yours, etc.

MAX FREEMAN.

Despite Mr. Freeman's request, we reproduce his letter in full.

WHO'S WHERE

Several directors have explained to us the difficulty they have of getting quickly into touch with artistes and others whom they need for their productions, and have suggested that we publish addresses and telephone numbers of such. For the benefit of all concerned, therefore, we are commencing a "Who's Where" feature, which will be printed weekly, and will be a list of names, addresses and 'phone numbers as the following example:—

ADAIR, MOLLY: 18, Stanlake Villas, Shepherd's Bush, London, W.2.

BELLAMY, GEORGE: 10, Culworth House, St. John's Wood, N.W.8.

CARR, CAMERON: 3, Minerva Road, Kingston-on-Thames.

DAVIS, REX: The Old Manor House, East Molesey, Surrey. 'Phone, Molesey 72.

This will provide a ready reference, and will obviously be of immense value to directors, artistes, cameramen, scenarists, art directors; in fact, to all who are engaged in British film production. The charge for this unique service is:—

Two lines, 12s. 6d. per thirteen insertions, or £2 5s. for a year, prepaid.

Extra lines, 1s. per insertion.

We intend to commence this feature next week, and therefore it will be necessary for you to let us have your order at once. Fill in the attached particulars, and post, together with remittance, to 93, Long Acre, W.C.2.

THE MONEY BOGEY

While there is often complaint at the quality of British pictures, it must not be overlooked that our Producing concerns are working under the huge handicap of restricted finance. In fact, this difficulty about finance is at the bottom of the whole question, and to save the industry fresh capital must be attracted. By the courtesy of the Moving Picture World, we are able to print the views of F. W. Heathcote, of the Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank, on the way in which producing companies may receive adequate financial support from the banks. These views, when read to apply to British conditions, are very interesting as well as informative.

III.—Concluding article,

My plan then contemplates that at each such studio an official be appointed, to be designated "controller." This controller would need to be a high-grade business man, thoroughly familiar with the financial end of the motion picture industry and prepared to make a deep and close study of same in all the minute details.

This controller would be employed by the studio company, but his salary distributed pro rata among the various producers renting space at such studio. The comptroller's services would be available to each director renting space in the studio, and he should have the necessary authority vested in him to have free access to the books, accounts and records, not only of the studio company but of each individual producer. He should then be in a position to advise each director on financial matters, and the elimination of waste, and should be the means of promoting co-operation, collective buying, obtaining materials in competitive markets, etc.

If this plan were to be put into operation, there would result a number of large studio companies, each housing a number of individual directors and each employing a high-grade controller.

At frequent and regular intervals the various controllers could meet in the form of an association for the purpose of exchanging ideas, obtaining from each other information regarding sources of supplies, cheapest markets, etc. The information obtained at such meetings could be passed along to the individual directors, and the result would be that each director in the industry would have the benefits of the experience of all other directors in an indirect fashion.

This plan should not destroy in any manner individual initiative or competition among directors, inasmuch as the success of each would depend upon the quality of pictures produced, and the latter could be improved in proportion as the cost of production was cut down, and unnecessary waste eliminated.

It would seem reasonable to suppose that under such a plan a bank or financial corporation would feel safer in financing a certain director or group of directors if they felt that the affairs of such director or directors were under constant supervision by a highly qualified outside controller.

An association of such controllers could very quickly secure effective and uniform accounting practices throughout the entire industry, and the latter would then be brought to the same plane as any other manufacturing industry and would be entitled to expect adequate financial assistance in proportion to the magnitude of the business.

Obviously, in the foregoing, I have touched but lightly upon some of the main features of the situation as it appears to me at present. I rather fear that some directors, if not the majority, would declare this plan to be too theoretical and impractical. Judging by my observations, I would expect this verdict, but I nevertheless maintain that some such plan is essential to the successful solution of the difficulties at present confronting the motion-picture industry.

We are a progressive people. We pride ourselves upon our efficiency and business sagacity. Will it be said that our motion-picture directors are content to drift along, trusting that some miracle will happen to relieve the present condition, or will they realise that prompt and businesslike action on their part is the only solution to the problems confronting them?

YOUR CORNER

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Amusing and Instructive.

I feel that I must write to say how I appreciate your paper. It has made wonderful progress during the last few weeks, and I really consider it a very useful journal for all engaged in the film industry. I also consider it amusing, as well as instructive, and enjoyed your "Nightmares" in the current issue.—SIDNEY JAY.

Budding Authors.

I quite agree with you with regard to the necessity of treating THE MOTION PICTURE STUDIO as a professional journal, and to be confined as far as possible to those in the profession. But, may I voice the opinion of those who, gifted with the technique and imagination, are, in earnest endeavour, trying to grasp the run of the market. (I am speaking on behalf of budding authors.) If you confine your journal strictly to the profession, then the emolument will never be within reach of those unknown, who are to all intents sacrificing general circulation of their scenarios and looking for better and more sympathetic consideration from the British markets.

To my knowledge THE MOTION PICTURE STUDIO is the only publication whereby they are able to visualise the requirements of British producing firms, such service being obtainable from "Screen Values" and "The Pulse of the Studio."—WILLIAM T. COLLIER.

SCREEN MEASURING UP THE

"The Puppet Man"

B. and C. Production—Directed by Frank Crane—Starring Mollie Adair and Johnny Reid—Photography by I. Roseman.

Many years ago there was in England a great boom in circus films, and, if we remember rightly, the Continental film companies were very generous in their supply of these subjects. B. and C. offers one of these old circus dramas, complete with the old clown, who, despite his illness, gives the performance of his life and then dies with his clown clothes clasped to his breast.

The picture drags terribly and has very little real interest. We understand that it has been severely cut since last time it was shown here, but even now it needs a great deal of cutting, and this can easily be done without damaging the story in any way.

So far as the direction is concerned, Frank Crane has done his work well, but the picture will have to undergo a lot more cutting.

The acting is in some parts as continental as the film. Some of the actors are quite good, however.

There is a little girl in the first half appearing as Bimbo who does some very fine acting.

Johnny Reid gives a good interpretation, but is quite unsuited for the part in the second half, where he should be a man of about forty.

Mollie Adair is quite good as the heroine.

The actor who plays the clown is a fine character, but the man who plays Bimbo is not too good.

Hugh Miller gives a highly successful performance in the title-role.

The continuity is none too good. The scenario writer has gone to great pains to explain the situation at length, and has made the story too long, with the result that each incident is almost a story on its own and there is hardly any main theme.

I. Roseman has secured some admirable exterior shots; his interiors are not nearly so good, although they have been very well lighted.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Good

LEADS: Adequate.

SUPPORTS: Good.

LITERARY: The story is too hackneyed, and the continuity is not too good.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Excellent in outdoor scenes; faulty occasionally indoors.

LIGHTING: Admirable.

EXTERIORS: Wonderful.

INTERIORS: Good.

"Four Men in a Van"

Direct—Starring Johnny Butt, Manning Haynes, Donald Searle and Gordon Hopkirk—Directed by Hugh Croise—Scenario by Hugh Croise—Photographed by Frank Grainger.

For real, good, clean humour, this would be hard to beat, and Hugh Croise can certainly lay claim to being one of our best English directors. It should stamp Britain as a film-producing country of merit. Technically, the production is really fine.

All the incidents have been well handled, and there is a smile in every foot of film.

The acting merits high praise. Johnny Butt gets a great deal of comedy out of his part, and plays it so naturally that one is apt to forget he is only acting.

Manning Haynes gives one of his very best performances, and much credit is due to him for the work he does.

Donald Searle and Gordon Hopkirk play their parts in a manner that is as flawless as the production.

H. V. Pedvin sustains his part well; the tramps give an equally good performance, and all the minor characters give good portrayals of their various rôles.

Hugh Croise has written an excellent scenario, which is packed with amusing incidents from beginning to end. The continuity has been well preserved and the subtitles are highly amusing and well written.

Frank Grainger has found some very picturesque locations, and has photographed them remarkably well. All through the photography, which to a great extent is exteriors, has been well done and does a great deal to help in making the picture the huge success it will undoubtedly be.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Flawless.

LEADS: Very good.

SUPPORTS: First rate.

LITERARY: Scenario very good; continuity very good; sub-titles very witty.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Excellent.

LIGHTING: Very effective.

INTERIORS: Good.

EXTERIORS: Really fine.

"How Kitchener was Betrayed"

Screen Plays—Starring Frank Goldsmith and Fred Paul—Directed by Percy Nash—Photography by Ernest E. Warneford—Scenario by Ramsay Norman, M.A.

If the Kitchener film was just an ordinary subject, with no publicity given it, then it would be regarded as a very poor offering. The film, as a film, might be classed as an ordinary spy drama, which we all suffered from during the early days of the war. The great trouble has been that the producers of the film have given the director, Percy Nash, a very bad story to work on, as they have had, they claim, to a great extent to deal with facts. Percy Nash has made the most out of the material.

So far as acting goes, Frank Goldsmith, who plays the German spy, is excellent. In the hands of some artistes, the spy would have become a scheming villain, who, if he really was a spy, would have been arrested on sight, by his suspicious movements. But not so Goldsmith. He has overcome all tendencies to over act, does not grind his teeth or glare at the English soldiers through half-closed eyes. He is an amiable sort of person, who gains his way into the society of the highest in the land by his pleasing manner. Goldsmith gives one of the finest pieces of acting we have seen and fills a very difficult rôle perfectly.

He does more work than any of the other artistes in the film—even more than Fred Paul, who makes a very fine Kitchener. Fred Paul's make-up is excellent and his work throughout the picture of a high quality.

— V A L U E S —

Peggy Hathaway does not play her part well—she is too unnatural.

Bertram Burleigh gives a good interpretation of the British officer, and the woman who acted as the spy is another well-filled rôle.

* * *

The writer of the scenario has made an attempt to get something out of the story, but it is far from perfect and the continuity is none too good. The incidents just occur, without even a sub-title to explain them, and at the end we wonder what it is all about.

The photography by Ernest Warneford leaves something to be desired. In some scenes the sets have not been given enough care, and the colours have not been taken into consideration, with the result that there is an over-abundance of blacks—very black—and whites—very white—clashing with each other, instead of melting into one another. Some scenes are full of high lights—the lighting is not good and many of the scenes are too flat. The exteriors are good at times.

* * *

As a photoplay, "How Kitchener Was Betrayed" is not a credit to the studio that turned it out.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Good.

LEADS: Frank Goldsmith and Fred Paul both give perfect performances.

SUPPORTS: Good, with a few exceptions.

LITERARY:—Story bad; scenario not too good; continuity bad.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Occasionally satisfactory.

LIGHTING: Bad.

EXTERIORS: Mostly good.

INTERIORS: Fair.

"The Road to London"

Bryant Washburn Production—Starring Bryant Washburn and Joan Morgan—Supports: Saba Raleigh, Gibb McLaughlin, George Foley, Rev. Dr. Batchelor—Directed by Eugene Muñen—Scenario by David S. Foster.

The scenario is based on the usual American screen traditions of English life, specimens of English aristocracy included. As types they are amusing, but quite inaccurate.

The continuity is good except at the end; the feature has probably been cut there.

There is one big fault. Neither at Windsor nor anywhere else in England can couples be married, without a licence, at a moment's notice. Other improbabilities and coincidences are very cleverly placed beyond criticism by the wording of the initial sub-title with its element of supposition.

The idea of "The Road to London" is excellent, the carrying-out, though ingenious, leaves much to be desired. The story is very slight, being a constant succession of chases in and around London's best known thoroughfares and environs.

* * *

Director and scenarist go wrong in playing as farce-comedy instead of farce, thus losing much of the fun of a most ingenious sequence. The distance the Duchess dodging hero covers without a penny in his pocket is amazing, and the constant succession of vehicles amusing and well contrasted.

Bryant Washburn's performance stands out well, though he seems a little obsessed by his responsibilities.

Joan Morgan has little to do, but looks charming and appealing.

The others—some are stiff, others exaggerated.

The character drawing is wrong, neither the Viscount nor Lady Emily exist except in the imagination of U.S.A. sentiment-mongers.

The exterior photographic work is excellent, only in very few shots is there any mistiness; the chases are well and clearly taken, close-ups entirely eliminated, and there are very few medium shots.

* * *

The panoramic view of Piccadilly Circus, which opens the film, is the best item photographically; the river and Green Dragon Inn are next best. Of the actual Road to London little or nothing is shown.

Sub-titling good and bright, and in a conversational vein. A few Americanisms in the speeches of English members of the cast tend to mar the production. The names of the various parts of London are all introduced into the sub-titles—commendable this, and usually lacking in British films made in or around places of interest.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Good, but action too slow.

LEADS: Washburn good and Joan Morgan satisfactory enough.

SUPPORTS: Fair.

LITERARY: No plot, incidents bright and plausible, except the marriage.

LIGHTING: Quite good, considering no studios used.

EXTERIORS: All excellent.

£1,000, and this sum has been advanced for the first year. Furnishing will cost at least £1,000, and decorations about £300.
Staff expenses for the first month will cost £100, and food and drink stocks about £200 for the same period. Kitchen and bar fixtures will cost another £200, and sundry expenses will involve, say, £100. Thus a minimum initial expenditure of nearly £3,000 has to be faced.

Of this £1,000 has been advanced (as above) and £180 has been subscribed. The subscription of the 250 Foundation Members will account for £787, leaving the Committee with the task of finding another £1,000 to start the Club.

Every enrolled members must therefore forward the subscription at once and if any more can be given as a subscription to the funds it will be greatly appreciated. Those members who can give £20 as life membership subscription will be assisting considerably. Producing concerns are also invited to subscribe and so follow the example of Gaumonts and International Artists.

On Sunday week, December 11, a special general meeting of all the members will be held at 2.30 in the afternoon, when the Permanent Committee will be elected and all the details of management and constitution will be decided upon.

IMPORTANT.—The absolutely final date for the enrolment of Foundation Members is Monday, December 5, when the Qualification Committee will meet for the last time prior to the general meeting. Apply without delay to the Hon. Secretary, 93, Long Acre, W.C.2, or 'Phone Gerrard 9870.

CAMERAMEN AT WORK

Kenneth Gordon was responsible for the photography of rather a big stunt last week. A number of famous stars gathered at the Tuscan Restaurant in Shaftesbury Avenue, after the theatres closed, and proceeded to hold high revels. Gordon arrived on the spot with a big mobile plant and a camera, and proceeded to film the whole affair.

* * *

Talking of mobile plants reminds me that a number of cameramen have been complaining that the police will not allow motors containing electric plant to be drawn up outside buildings being filmed. The inspectors at Vine Street, however, have been very good in allowing cameramen to get their plant outside whenever possible.

* * *

Cameramen have had their share of fog the last few weeks, but despite this some very good work has been turned.

* * *

The big topical stunt of the year was the filming of the Cenotaph on November 11. It is the cameraman who enables all the people of the Empire to see the ceremony, for even though they are thousands of miles away, they will see the whole ceremony by means of the screen.

* * *

A certain topical cameraman was sent down to Deal last week to film a wreck. The only thing of real interest about it was the broken mast. He filmed the ship, but when he attempted to get on to the deck to set a close-up of the mast, the men in charge refused to allow him up, unless he paid two pounds!

TRADE UNION No. 1796

by M. P. PROUT

The haste displayed by the K.C.S. in forming itself into a trade union rather inclines one to the view that this was the chief object of its formation.

This special form of trade unionism—craft unionism—has many good features, and provided only that its members realise that the interests of a whole industry are of more importance than the interests of any group or section there is little to be said against it.

The utterances of those who act as sponsors for trade union No. 1796 would lead one to suspect that instead of being concerned with the ultimate benefit of the Film Trade, they merely view that industry through spectacles of self-interest.

All this talk about "giving away information and technical details which had taken them years to learn," always betokens a type of mind which I cannot bring myself to believe is in accordance with either good policy or good taste. A man who uses such language is not likely to give away anything, and a society consisting of such will not gain much in the way of mutual benefit. It betokens little of self-confidence and no consideration of the personal factor.

Fully appreciating the artistic possibilities of this new art, and especially the photographic possibilities, I was minded, when the K.C.S. was first formed, to apply for membership. Considerations of competition would not have weighed, as I have no intention of becoming a cameraman. I should have joined far more in the hope of being able to help than to learn. I do not wish it to be implied that the K.C.S. has suffered any loss in this particular case, but I do believe that this policy of rigid exclusion is narrow-minded, and one that conceivably cuts two ways.

Apart from the personal factor, the results of experience cannot be given away if the experience is of the kind that teaches anything worth while. Does any cameraman think that Rodier Heath can, by merely attending the meetings of the K.C.S., become an experienced cameraman or a dangerous competitor?

Rodier Heath has written to "Tripod," who conducts the Cameramen's Section of this journal, with reference to the K.C.S. decision. He says:—

"I much regret that the cameramen could not see their way to admit student members' to the K.C.S. Might I point out that it was never my intention that the cameramen should be asked to give away all the 'tricks' of the business? No man who has spent years perfecting various effects which now help to make his work superior to that of his competitors can be expected to give this information away broadcast. But it did seem to me that there must be much groundwork upon which the foundations of good cinematography must be built, which the cameramen might safely impart to the student members without seriously endangering their own jobs. When this groundwork had been mastered, and the student was capable of producing a passable straight negative, then each must find out for himself whatever 'tricks' might be necessary to enable him to compete with those who, in any case, have the advantage of many years experience.

Supporting British Pictures.

ONE of the latest of the many newspaper film stunts is an attack on the exhibitor for not giving more support to British films. One writer declares that British pictures are only booked by a tenth of the exhibitors and that is the reason why the output of the British studios is so small. This diagnosis is completely wrong. Any really good British film can be fairly well booked and at prices higher than are usually paid for American and other foreign productions. The reason why the output of British studios is small is that our directors have not yet found a means of competing with America for the world's markets, and, being confined to the comparatively small home markets, are not able to put out a large number of films or to spend big sums on their production. If, as has been suggested, each country showed in its kinemas mainly its own productions, it may be doubted whether many countries would find it commercially possible to make films. A far better method is that which is now automatically taking place: that countries which have been over-producing should limit the number of films made and fill up their programs with pictures from other countries. America has taken the lead, and Germany is following it. Already the second biggest producing unit there has cut down its own program and is seeking to buy French and British pictures to bring its output up to the required number. Ultimately, there is little doubt, more countries capable of producing really big pictures will produce a limited number and the screens of all of them will become international in fact instead of in theory—and American theory at that.

The Recrudescence of the Ramp.

NOW that some of the exposures and the prosecutions which followed are being forgotten, the bogus producing company is raising its head again. During the past week we have received two complaints which need further investigation before they can be detailed fully. One of them concerns an organisation which purports to be about to start on a big film for a Colonial financier. It advertises for beginners and aspirants, and from those who are stupid enough to answer it demands a heavy fee for a course of lessons. Another has vacancies for beginners in its studio and requests a small fee for a test—adding that experience is not necessary. We are under the impression that experience is just what these gullible aspirants need most, and that if they have anything to do with

The Coming of German Films.

WHEN German films had their post-war revival in New York they were well received by the public, and the Press for the most part declared that it was a good thing that they were being shown, if only because they gave American directors new ideas. Later attempts were made to show some of them in Los Angeles. The attempts were very ill-timed, for they came at a moment when large numbers of artistes and directors were without work. Many studios had closed down and many had reduced their production by half, and it was easy to draw the superficial conclusion that the incoming of foreign films was the cause. The fact that the real cause was a realisation that America had been producing far too much and far too extravagantly was overlooked or deliberately ignored, and a strong agitation against German films in particular and foreign pictures in general was begun. It was the starting point of the campaign for an import duty, which has been misrepresented in some quarters on this side, who have tried to create capital out of the proposals by suggesting, stupidly enough, that they were the outcome of a fear that British pictures had improved to such an extent that they would soon rival the Americans.

Will it Cause Trouble?

IT is now reasonably certain that some of the biggest German films—the ordinary program productions are not worth considering—will be shown in London early next year. That this attempt was to be made was reported in the Kinematograph Weekly nearly a year ago. Now it is rapidly materialising, and there are definite prospects that "Dubarry," "Anne Boleyn," "Sumurun," and other German supers will be put on at a West End theatre about the beginning of March. If it serves to revive a flagging public interest in picture plays, it is to be welcomed.

these fee-demanding merchants they are likely to get it! None of these people ever seek publicity through the Trade or professional papers, none of them have any record as directors or any standing as artistes. They work, through the medium of small advertisements in the daily papers, on the credulity of fools and the needs of the unemployed. Even where—as may be the case in isolated instances—they are honestly trying to start film production without capital, it is a reprehensible method and can only lead to disaster. Where they are not honest—which is the case with most of them—they need exposure and suppression, and we are arranging to put a special commissioner on the task of doing both in the interests of legitimate studio workers.

MARCH OF THE MARIONETTES

By ANSON DYER, the Hepworth Film Cartoonist

No, I do not pull strings. But the simile is adequate, for my own little company of "players" are marionettes—they go whither I will lead them, and remain where I command, except when . . . but my pen is starting off at the wrong end.

The Editor of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO has asked me to tell his readers something about the technicalities of screen cartoon work. I make one bold effort to excite your sympathy in the early stages (I shall get it, anyway, before I'm through if you've got a heart that functions properly!) by telling you that a cartoon which takes ten minutes to show upon the screen, provides me with "hard labour" for at least two months!

And now I have your sympathy, I'll tell you all about it.

Apart from technicalities, which every craftsman must wrestle with and conquer, the cartoonist will find his first efforts at screen work a comparatively simple and easy proposition to those of his later ones. But when he has evolved, say, half a dozen film cartoons, he will begin to sit up and wonder why, in the name of his own intelligence (he always believes he's endowed with some, and there's a good deal in the power of suggestion), he didn't chose a political career. Moulding the destiny of a Nation must be child's play compared to creating laughs for a sob-soaked community.

The floor space of my "stage" is limited—and that's table space. The camera is fixed over the table, upside down, so that the lens come into direct contact with the "sets" on the table underneath. These "sets" consist of pieces of cardboard, measuring about 20 ins. by 15 ins., on which I have drawn, in complete half-tone pictures (not in line drawings), the backgrounds on which my marionettes work. Each one of my figures is drawn and cut out, in accordance with the proportion of the background, and, like the priceless doll you can never afford to buy your baby, their arms move, their legs move, their eyes move, and they do everything except sing.

And now the agony commences.

Seated on a high chair by my table I have to remember that everything which comes within range of the camera lens will be photographed, so that I must keep away from the danger zone, particularly remembering that if I bend my head forward under the glaring light, the result will be a perfectly beautiful (but in the circumstances, useless) pictorial version of my nice crisp curls!

For each scene there is a separate background, but I'm not troubled with many changes during the day; one scene will generally provide me with sufficient labour for a working day.

I have used the Boy Scout movement as a basis for one of my series of Hepworth film cartoons, and for the purpose of enlightenment, we will suppose that I want to make the Boy Scout salute. I commence by moving his tiny paper arm the fraction of an inch, with great care and caution, handling the figure only with the tips of my fingers, and taking great care not to move any other "player" who may be appearing in the scene. I press a button on my left and the small action is photographed. But to complete the salute I should probably make ten movements of that arm, which would mean that the action itself consists of ten little pictures. A cartoon which can be screened in ten minutes contains something like thirteen thousand separate movements—all photographed separately!

And there is no going back. The intricacies of the work demand that I shall know, within the obvious limitations, what my results will be before I commence photographing, so that I have to visualize every minute action of my figures before I attempt to create it. The animator's greatest achievement is natural movement, and to get this I find it necessary to focus the attention of the audience on one figure at a time. If another figure happens to be on the scene, I must pose it in such an impelling, natural way, that the lack of movement on the part of the figure is not obvious.

There is one disastrous faux pas which it is amazingly easy for a cartoonist to make. In fitting shame and humiliation I confess to having made it once. After working strenuously on a cartoon for two months, I found that the camera lens had been closed the whole time, and not a single action had photographed! (Aftermath unprintable.)

But there is one ray of sunshine that creeps through the dense blackness of the clouds that envelop the cartoonist. No matter how big the scene, no matter how dramatic or humorous the situation, I can take a rest, my lunch, or a cigarette as I feel inclined. I can leave my Boy Scout suspended in mid-air with "no visible means of support," on his way up to the clouds, and come back an hour later to find him still there—and still smiling!

I have no trouble with my "artistes," for they go whither I lead them, and remain where I command, except when—well, I may inadvertently leave the window open on a blustering day, and then I shall return to find them playing catch-as-catch-can over the floor.

DEFYING DEATH

Playing conjuring tricks with Fate, with Grim Death holding a watching brief, requires more than the average amount of pluck, and certainly marks the conjurer out as a distinctive personality. And yet the C. L. Ager we interviewed this week is a quiet, unassuming young man, with no pretensions to distinction other than a steady, confident look that betrays the cool-headedness of the man.

Although not a new recruit to the screen, C. L. Ager, the famous steeplejack, is only now starting to take up screen work seriously. Ager seems to spend most of his time in devising hair-raising stunts for filming, and to judge by the ideas he has in mind for a film serial, he has not very long to live.

He was recently being filmed doing a stunt on top of a chimney stack, which was about 150 feet in height. Far below, Ager could just discern the cameraman, standing in front of a crowd of people who had assembled to watch the entertainment. Not wanting to disappoint the crowd, or the cameraman, he had a rope fastened to the top of the chimney so that it dangled down fifteen feet. Then, leaping into space, he caught hold of the rope, after having fallen fifteen feet, thoroughly alarmed the crowd and given the cameraman one of the best film stunts ever attempted.

Ager was slightly hurt about a year ago when he fell a hundred feet from a flag-staff, but such accidents do not deter him from attempting something more daring.

Aerial feats are another pastime of his. During the war he served in the Royal Air Force, and it was then he learnt a few things about aviation. He undertakes to perform any aerial stunt known, and has a few more stunts of his own which are not known, but for which he is only waiting an opportunity to carry out.

Of course, with his skill and courage, he should make an ideal serial hero, and the probabilities are that he will shortly be seen in one of the most dare-devil stunt serial films ever made, and one which will make every other stunt film look like a sentimental drama.

At the moment, he has completed his training, so that he can now offer to do the most astounding stunt yet devised. This is as follows: He will, for any film company, motor along in a light car, which will be picked up, while travelling, by a grappling iron at the end of a rope suspended from an aeroplane overhead in full flight. The 'plane will rise with the car at the end of the rope. In the car, Ager will get out a parachute, attach the car to it, cut the rope holding the car to the 'plane, and allow himself and the car to descend to terra firma suspended from the parachute.

The very thought of such a stunt takes the breath away, but this cool, calm stuntist talks of it with no sense of bombast, but as just stating a commonplace.

Mr. Ager goes so far as to issue a world challenge to anyone to attempt a stunt that he cannot do and go one better.

He is prepared to out-Fairbanks Fairbanks on any of Doug's stunts.

It must not be overlooked that there is a public demand for real thrillers, and hitherto this country has not been able to make such for want of a British film dare-devil. Now that Ager has trained himself (with the advantage of being a champion steeplejack) to perform the most breath-taking stunts, it only requires an enterprising film concern to supply the public demand.

Intimate Studio Gossip

I am given to understand that "The Glorious Adventure" will be shown on Sundays at the Coliseum, beginning on Sunday week.

Directors have to be resourceful in a climate such as ours. The other evening Sinclair Hill set out from the Stoll studios just as the shades of night were falling fast, with a car and a motor lorry, his assistant, his cameraman, Joan Morgan and Philip Simmons, with Hyde Park for his destination and the taking of a pretty little love scene for his purpose. However, a mist began to rise; and by the time the party reached the Park the latter was comparatively dense. "Now we're done," gloomily remarked the cameraman. But Mr. Hill refused to be beaten. "We'll make the scene 'Love in a Mist,'" he decided, "and instead of soft moonlight, we'll try to get some really good fog effects. It'll be much more unusual." The scene was taken in this way, and the result more than justified the change of method.

Whilst fencing with her husband one day last week, Mary Dibley lost her footing and fell, severely injuring one of her ankles. Fortunately the injury is not serious, and Miss Dibley hopes to have recovered before the end of the week. "Despite all my falls in the hunting field, I have never been laid up on account of them," she says, "and it seems very cruel Fate that destined me to be laid up through indoor sport."

Following up her recent activities in British filmland, Violet Hopson now announces that she has completed the biggest deal yet attempted by a woman in British filmland. She has sold the world's rights of all her films for the next two years to Butcher's Film Service. Whilst others actively interested in the manufacture of British films have been "waiting for something to turn up," Miss Hopson has achieved her object. This deal cannot be passed lightly, for when one considers the amount of finance, labour and trouble involved in the manufacture of these first-class British films, one realises that the negotiations now brought to a successful conclusion have involved a tremendous amount of care and forethought on Miss Hopson's part—more especially at the present time when the majority of film manufacturers are wringing their hands and hoping for better times to come. Despite her dramatic ability, Miss Hopson also possesses a keen business sense, a combination rarely found in a man, more rarely in a woman.

* * *

Ten years ago the name of Violet Hopson was practically unknown to the public. She was at that time playing small parts in some of the first British films. Gradually, but surely, Miss Hopson has forged her way to the front rank of the world's film personalities—first as a leading artiste; then as a star, and later as the central figure of one of our best-known British film companies. Now she has not only consolidated her position as a star, but has once again proved that her position as a woman in the British film world is pre-eminent. Miss Hopson is fortunate in having associated with her in her new undertaking Walter West, who will personally direct all the new productions in which this popular artiste will appear.

With the completion of "The Adventures of Mr. Pickwick," Thomas Bentley scored his thirtieth British picture, seven of which have been versions of the best known of Dickens' stories. His earliest Dickens' story made for Cecil Hepworth eleven years ago from "Oliver Twist," was sent to Germany where it was promptly turned down by the censors on the ground that the scene in which Nancy died was too violent for German film patrons! It is an interesting fact that there is not a British star of note that Bentley has not directed, nor a single type of British picture, including comedy, he has not made. He is likely in the near future to be engaged in making a comedy, the story of which has been written by one of our best story-tellers.

From Evelyn Brent, who is now playing the title rôle in the new F.P.-Lasky British film, "The Spanish Jade," come details of her journey to Sevilla, where exterior scenes for the film are now being made. "What a trip it has been," she says. "We left Southampton on Friday, reached Vigo on Sunday afternoon, left for Madrid on Monday morning, reaching the Spanish capital on Tuesday night, and finally reached Sevilla on Friday night. But Sevilla is very beautiful and compensates well for the long, tiring journey." Her dresses for the film are all being made in Spain, in order to ensure accuracy of detail. Miss Brent, having mastered the footwork for her Spanish dance, is now learning to use castanets.

I saw a really big set at the Hardy Studios on Monday last which represented a street in old London during the Plague. The set was one of the biggest and solidest ever built in England, and has real cobble stones in the street. Although the day was dull, Geoffrey Malins was still keeping on with the work and Germain Burger was filming, with the aid of a few lamps, taken from the dark studio. If the set is anything to judge by, the picture, which will be called "The Scourge" should be a super production of "MEGAPHONE." some merit.

TOPICAL MEN'S

The results in the form of film pictures of current events obtained by the corps of cameramen attached to such an organisation as the Pathé Gazette may not always be of a dramatic or novel character, says Pathé Messenger, but behind many of the "stories" that are filmed and flashed upon the screen there are interesting tales to be told of difficulties overcome, long, dreary journeys patiently undertaken, and on occasion risks of life and limb cheerfully accepted if there is a chance of getting a film news "scoop."

A most exasperating experience was that of a Gazette cameraman who had been sent from London to Aberdeen to film a military inspection. Having obtained his pictures he arrived back at King's Cross in the early hours of the morning, tired and unkempt, looking forward eagerly to a change of clothes and a long rest. He was met at the station by a messenger with fresh instructions from headquarters. Imagine his feelings when he opened the envelope and read: "Please report without delay to Mr. X., who requires pictures of a local function. His kinema is near Aberdeen."

On the occasion of the trip of a relief ship to the lighthouses and lightships near the Scilly Isles, a Gazette cameraman obtained permission to accompany the vessel. The weather was what seamen call "dirty." It rapidly reduced the cameraman to a condition when he was too weak from seasickness to bother about any description of it. For two days and two nights he lay prostrate in his tiny bunk. Then he managed to stagger up on deck and secure what turned out to be an exceedingly interesting film record of a novel expedition.

Topical cameramen are not only expected to cover long distances with a minimum loss of time, but they have also to stand on one spot for hours on end in order to make sure of getting pictures of important public events from good positions. The record "stand" is held by the Pathé Gazette film man who stood the whole of a day and a night in the same restricted area of a few square yards on the occasion of King Edward's funeral. After the films had been secured and delivered to headquarters he went straight to a massage establishment to have his aching muscles and stiff joints restored to their natural suppleness.

The aeroplane has entered very closely into the organisation of big film news "scoops." As aerial transport is not yet independent of the human factor, the use of the air-way sometimes leads to trouble. Last year the Pathé Gazette films of the Grand National were brought from Liverpool to London by air. But the pilot lost his way in a mist, and after flying for some hours found that he was at Ipswich and not, as he thought, near London. The rest of the trip was a nightmare, both for the pilot groping along in semi-darkness, and the film man in the passenger's seat, cuddling the box of negative films.

The journey was eventually stopped by complete darkness in the garden of a Northern suburb, when the cameraman hired a taxi, and by a wild dash to Wardour Street, and terrific hustling in the developing and printing rooms, several copies of the film of this classic race were screened in the West End before the close of the kinemas, thus creating a record which was even more creditable in view of the additional difficulties that had been overcome.

When filming public events in the summer there are climatic compensations for the strenuous nature of the work, but in the winter time there is very little to relieve the rigours of open-air filming, tedious trips in cold trains, and unavoidable long waits in rain, snow and hail.

A typical winter's outing for a cameraman was one undertaken on Christmas Eve. There had been a train wreck in an obscure part of the provinces. The Pathé Gazette man arrived at the station nearest to the wreck at 3 a.m. on Christmas morning. He then had to arouse the proprietor of some stables in order to charter a conveyance to take him some seven miles to the scene of the disaster.

Cold and hungry, he secured his films, returned by "trap" the same way, and waited long hours for another train to take him back to town. Arriving home very late, when the Christmas festivities were nearly over, he insisted on reciting a doleful parody of the well-known poem, commencing "'Twas Christmas Day at the train-wreck"

But one of the most heartbreaking experiences any film cameraman has surely suffered happened to a member of the Gazette organisation who was despatched to a small village in the heart of the Scottish Highlands in order to film an ice hockey team.

Equipped only with the name of the place where the team were supposed to play, he eventually reached his destination after nearly two days in trains, and discovered that there was a hockey team in the village. Much patient inquiry unearthed the secretary of the team, who on being asked if his team was the one that had been mentioned in the Press, replied: "Oh, no, we are only a scratch amateur team; you must mean the hockey players living in Switzerland. The name of their town is very much like the name of ours."

It was a very limp cameraman who staggered back to the station to retrace his weary steps to London.

DANCING TO STARDOM

by FLORA LE BRETON

Opinions regarding dancing before the camera differ considerably from the cameraman's and the professional dancer's points of view. Terpsichore is not altogether a suitable film type. However, even if all dances cannot be filmed successfully, there are those which, if adapted to the limitations of the camera, have excellent results. In any case, the dancer always has an advantage over her non-dancing sister, where film work is concerned. Dancing of any kind tends to make the individual (who interests herself in the art) more graceful.

The average British screen artiste scarcely realises the tremendous help the sister art can be to her when she sets out to obtain film work. One of the finest examples of the successful combination of the arts is Nazimova. She has seized a right opportunity in every one of her pictures and dances when the story is at its climax. By this means she gives full vent by her expressive movements to the emotions of which her weird film characters are possessed.

Atmosphere can be assisted tremendously in a film by the introduction of suitable dances. For instance, can anyone imagine a film story set in the Orient minus a dancing episode? In costume plays carrying us back to the time of powdered wigs and patches, the graceful minuet adds to the interest in the story.

Dancing on the stage differs tremendously from that which one associates with the film. The limited space at the artiste's disposal when playing before the camera necessitates a very careful study of movement—in fact before the camera a dance becomes the concentrated essence of the stage dance. Another thing which one has to remember is that the movements for the film must not be jerky and uneven.

To me film dancing appeals far more than stage work, for the simple reason that stage dancing means long, tiresome rehearsals, with the result that one's movements are apt to become mechanical, whilst when dancing before a camera the actions are just rehearsed once or twice, and then the scene is filmed. Film dancing is spontaneous—it is usually created on the spur of the moment, inspired only by beautiful music.

FLORA LE BRETON

My first big opportunity in filmland came my way because I could dance. "La Poupée" necessitated some character dancing—and although I might have been suitable temperamentally and physically to the part, it is certain I should not have been engaged had I not been able to dance. Recently I was selected to interpret the leading part in the song film "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay," and I loved every minute of this little production. Dancing is my idea of heaven, and when I dance I live—forgetting all my troubles and worries, and am transported into a world of make-believe.

SIMPLE SONGS ON KINE. SUBJECTSI.—The Kamrah-man.

I.

THE Kamrah-man's the man I like,
Although I think he's rum,
He turns a handle all day long,
To make the pictures come.
And then he's so intelligent,
He talks about my face,
And if my nose is shiny
He puts powder on the place.

II.

THE Kamrah-man's the man I like,
I like him far the best,
For when we're on exteriors,
And he should want a rest,
He says, "the atmosphere is full Of non-actinic rays,"
And then I take my make-up off
And do not work for days.

III.

THE "Prod-ju-sah" is rude to me;
He says just what he thinks,
But almost any Kamrah-man
Will let you stand him drinks.
And so I give him whisky-splash,
And fill him up with praise;
Because I like the Kamrah-man,
And also 'cause it pays.

IV.

HE keeps my feet in focus,
And he sees my face ain't black;
He makes my hair look lovely
With a spot-light at the back.
He gives me little bits of film,
To show the folks next door;
And if I'm not developed,
He develops me some more.

V.

WHEN I get to the Studio
The "Prod-ju-sah" will say:
"Good heavens, aren't you made up yet
I can't wait here all day!"
But when I find the Kamrah-man
He smiles, and says—says he:
"I'm busy in the dark-room,
You can order one for me!"

* * *

I USED to like the Kamrah-man,
But now I don't no more,
Because I touched his "Kamerah"
When it was on the floor,
He threw away my whisky-splash,
And called me "clumsey lout!"
I hate the beastly Kamrah-man—
He's irising me out!

REMINISCENCES OF THE OLD LONDON

by GERALD AMES

With me the old London ranks with the St. James's Theatre and F. R. Benson's Shakespearean Company. F. R. Benson's Company gave me my first start as a provincial actor. It was at the St. James's that I first had a run as a West End actor, and the London Film Company gave me my first screen opportunity. It was in 1912, I had just returned from Stockholm, where I had been fencing for England, when the London Company sent for me to come down and fence in a picture called "The Dream." I was working at Drury Lane at the time, and did not take film work seriously, but George Loane Tucker, who was about to do his first London film, took me from the Lane and gave me the leading part in "The Cage," a mediæval story. During this film my horse's tail touched the live wire of an electric cable, and the studio was nearly wrecked as a result!

After my first lead in a London production I settled down to film work and played in all Tucker's productions.

At Ightham Moat, in Kent, we were filming a big fight scene in "The Prisoner of Zenda," in which I had to fence a dozen soldiers, and then dive into the moat and swim to the opposite bank, where I had to climb up a rope ladder previously put there by one of my accomplices. The waters of the moat were cold, and Henry Ainley, who was supposed to swim after me, had already been lowered into the water, and was waiting his cue. Somehow or other, all those on the bank got interested in an argument that was going on and forgot Ainley altogether. Many minutes had passed before we were suddenly recalled to the moat by Ainley's shout. After we had both done our aquatic act, we had to wander round various parts of the ground and be photographed fencing, but before every shot we had to submit to be drenched with water from the buckets of the property men so as to keep up the illusion of our recent ducking!

I next played in a Maurice Elvey production, "The Princess of Happy Chance," and then came "Arsène Lupin." Rupert of Hentzau, Arsène Lupin and Raffles are my three favourite rôles.

In "The Christian" I had to love Elizabeth Ridsen, who had to forget me and fall in love with a clergyman. But I had not been acquainted with the fact that there was another character in the play, who was called Polly Love, and who died young. Consequently when, in a big scene between Miss Ridsen and myself, Miss Ridsen said "Polly Love is dead!" I turned to Mr. Tucker and asked, "What is she calling me Polly for, Mr. Tucker?" There was no more work done for an hour and a half, while Tucker gave me a very detailed description of the high esteem in which he held me!

I always look back with pleasure to those old London days, because we were all such a happy little family, and even although we all get together again and meet all the old people, it does not seem quite the same, for we can never get the same combination again. The film industry owes the London a great debt of gratitude, because it kept the flag flying through the most difficult period in the history of the British picture profession. It was the London which started a great many of us on what proved to be successful careers. Two of our best directors, Maurice Elvey and Harold Shaw, started at the London; and then, of course, there was George Loane Tucker as well. There are many more who, if they turn back, would discover that it was the London Company that set them on the road to success.

TOLD OVER THE LUNCH TABLE

"I remember," said Gerald Ames, the other day, "rather an amusing incident that occurred to me once, while I was appearing in 'Rupert of Hentzau.' It was the big chase scene and I was supposed to be escaping on horseback. I had to dash across some fields, plunge into a stream and come out on the other bank. I was given a beautiful horse to ride on, but when I suggested that I should see if it would take the water, the director said it was quite unnecessary. The scene was 'shot,' the horse took the water all right, and I took it too, mouthfuls of it! The horse proceeded to lay down in the middle of the stream and I had a terrific struggle to get my legs free. Meanwhile, on the bank, there was much merriment from sundry onlookers. It was a few weeks later that I discovered that the horse I rode on that occasion was the famous diving horse, which appeared at the London Hippodrome for a great number of weeks."

Leslie Dawson, the art director at F. P.-Laskey's studio, tells that last month he came upon Ann Forrest, who was "resting" between scenes in the luxurious four-poster in which Saville Mender, in "Perpetua," breathes his last. Mr. Dawson ventured to interpose between Ann and the after-lunch cigarette dream to inform her that her presence was imperative in the next scene.

"I suppose you know, Miss Forrest," I said in a casual way, "that it was on this bed that Queen Elizabeth rested on the night before the coming of the Spanish Armada?"

"Well," said Ann, taking another puff, "if I'd been in Queen Elizabeth's place, I'd have thanked my stars for a really comfortable shake-down and overslept myself."

At the meeting of the Kinema Club Committee, last Monday, Bertram Burleigh, after doing a little conjuring trick with his thumb, and after teaching the editor how to play the latest top-game, asked the company if they'd heard the latest about Harry Lauder. There was a chorus of negatives, and an expectant pause while "B. B." made reply:

"He's given £500 to the next-of-kin of the Unknown Warrior."

AROUND THE (STUDIO) TOWN

One of the things that the British film industry stands in need of is propaganda—the art of letting the public know what fine studios, excellent equipment and expert staffs we have. And in the weekly issues of "Around the Town" — the "different" topical — this propaganda is being provided. Each week insights into the work of different British studios are given, and these are shown on the screens of thousands of kinemas. The result of this excellent publicity must inevitably be the restoration of the confidence of financiers in the stability of the producing industry and the introduction of fresh capital. Here are our cuttings from "Around the Town" showing (1) Major Chas. Bell discussing the next Famous Players-Lasky production with George Fitzmaurice; (2) Anna Q. Nilsson in an emotional scene in "Three Live Ghosts"; (3) Long-distance view of Islington Studios; and (4) Anna Q. Nilsson as a soft-focus study.

KINEMA CLUB NEWS

To-morrow, Sunday, December 11, at 2.30, the first general meeting of members of the club will be held in the Inns of Court Institute. This building is in Drury Lane, midway between the Strand end and the New Oxford Street end, and near the end of Long Acre. The nearest tube stations are Holborn and Covent Garden (Piccadilly), or British Museum (Central London). 'Bus No. 44 from Victoria almost passes the door.

This meeting is of vital importance, and those present will have the power and the opportunity to mould the whole constitution and future of the club, and those who stay away from this meeting will only have themselves to blame if the club is not run on lines satisfactory to them.

Every member must attend.

Invitation cards have been sent out to all enrolled members, and admission will only be granted to members.

The business of the meeting is as follows:—

Statement of progress by the hon. secretary, including the report of the committee.

Election of chairman for that meeting.

Election of officers and standing executive committee, to consist of president, vice-presidents, financial and general secretary, and a committee composed of two men and two lady artistes, two (men) directors, two (men) cameramen, one man and one woman scenarist, two (men) representatives of the general studio staffs. This committee will have power to co-opt sub-committees, including house, qualification, and special committees.

Name of the club to be decided. Names suggested: Kinema or Shadow Club.

Adoption of constitution.

Arrangements for opening functions.

The committee recommends:

"That after December 1 subscriptions be increased to £5 5s."

The committee recommends:

"That membership be thrown open to all who are engaged in the producing side of the British Kinematograph industry under the following heads:—Directors, assistant directors, art directors, artistes, scenarists, scenario editors, cine. cameramen, studio managers, casting directors, authors of books that have been filmed, heads of studio departments, technical directors, location managers and managing directors of producing organisations. All applications to be subject to passing the Qualification Committee."

We are asked by the committee to urge all enrolled members to forward their subscriptions without any further delay. The initial expenses of the club will be very heavy—the committee has worked hard for the past five months, and now the members must show signs of support by contributing to the funds. Several members have sent along extra guineas to the General Fund, and these gifts are greatly appreciated. Other gifts include:—

Very large marble clock from Bertram Burleigh.

Similar gifts will be gladly received.

The builders are now on the premises, which are undergoing a transformation, so that, it is hoped that by Christmas, Nos. 8 and 9 Great Newport Street will be opened as the Kinema Club. The premises comprise four large floors, and are ideally situated for club purposes.

We consider that at this juncture, it is only right to pay a tribute of thanks, on behalf of the Industry, to the hard-working and enthusiastic committee that has, for five long months, toiled nobly for the formation of the club. Night after night they have rushed away from tiring days in the studios to deliberate and model the scheme of the club. When the club is in full swing, some idea of the huge task undertaken and successfully accomplished will be gained. Whether this committee becomes the standing Executive Committee or not it will be found that their labour in forming the club and knowledge of all its details will be felt as a beneficial influence throughout the whole Industry. This committee is comprised of:—George Ridgewell, Duncan McRae, Maurice Elvey, Rex Davis, Eille Norwood, Arthur Walcott, Sydney Paxton, Bertram Burleigh, Adrian Brunel, William J. Elliott, Alfred H. Moses, H. Sanders, Dorothy Fane, Kate Gurney, Mrs. Hayden Coffin, Betty Balfour, Madge Stuart, Frank A. Tilley and the Hon. Secretary.

A final word: Be in your seats sharp at 2.30 on Sunday, for there is much business to transact.

NIGHTMARES

 This feature has been received so favourably and become so popular, that we will continue it as long as is practicable. With a little judicious cutting and a consequent speeding up of the action this will be one of the best items of film entertainment from a British studio. It is not melodramatic, and yet it has sufficient dramatic properties to make it gripping and powerful.

* * *

And yet it is not the director's fault that the film requires a little cutting; as a matter of fact, the cutting operation will be very difficult, because there is no padding in the film. Will Kellmo's "showmanship" hand can be discerned behind the production, and all his work is of the highest quality. He has been fortunate in being provided with a faultless scenario, and he has accordingly maintained the continuity without a break.

* * *

The cast has been well chosen, and the members are successful from first to last.

Judd Green's performance is a personal triumph over the temptations to over-emphasis.

Pauline Johnson submits a portrayal of the heroine, which is as convincing as it is natural. Her artistry is above reproach.

David Hawthorne's performance evidences polish and finesse, while Cecil du Gue is really excellent.

Tom Coventry makes a characteristic appearance and sustains his rôle with great success.

The camera work is of a high order, lighting being excellent.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Good.

LEADS: Excellent.

SUPPORTS: First-rate.

LITERARY: Scenario and continuity very good.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Perfect.

LIGHTING: Excellent.

INTERIORS: Well-staged.

EXTERIORS: Very fine.

"The Mayor of Casterbridge"

Progress—Starring Fred Groves—Directed by Sidney Morgan—Scenario by Sidney Morgan.

Slow in action, this is nevertheless a picture which can be considered a good production. The original story is hardly suited for adaption to the screen, and it is much to Sidney Morgan's credit that the film has turned out half so well as it has. "The Mayor of Casterbridge" is a good example of a British screen-play.

* * *

Fred Groves has some fine opportunities, which he does not allow to pass. As Henrichard he gives one of his best screen performances. The success of the film will, to a great extent be due to his clever work in this rôle.

Pauline Peters is adequate in the rôle of the wife, while Warwick Wardle plays his part without doing anything conspicuous.

Nell Emerald and Mavis Clare both give pleasing interpretations of their rôles.

* * *

The plot is a masterly one, and Sidney Morgan has adapted the story to the screen in fine style. Although it is necessarily very slow moving, the story is well told and the continuity good.

* * *

The photography is of a high standard throughout, without containing any very notable shots. It is remarkably clear, however, and quite in keeping with the picture.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Admirable.

LEADS: Fred Groves' work is an outstanding feature.

SUPPORTS: Mostly good.

LITERARY: Well adapted; continuity and scenario good; plot well-worked out.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Clear.

EXTERIORS: Very fine.

INTERIORS: Adequate.

LIGHTING: Good.

"Froggy's Little Brother"

Stoll—Starring Maurice Thompson—Directed by A. E. Coleby—Photography by D. P. Cooper.

Here the director reveals himself as more versatile than ever. "Froggy's Little Brother" is well handled and highly sentimental with a delicate touch.

Thanks to the skill of the director the story—full of incidents—makes a coherent and interesting photo-play. It is a testimony to the care and expert knowledge of A. E. Coleby, who has imparted a sense of realism that is quite convincing.

* * *

Most of the members of the cast are juveniles, and these are quite adequate.

Maurice Thompson is Froggy and is fairly good, although he suggests that his vocabulary of gestures and expressions is rather limited.

Stephen Frayne is really excellent, while Harry Gilbey is quite good also.

* * *

D. P. Cooper can be relied on to submit photography that can bear critical investigation—his camera work on this production is up to his usual high standard. He has secured some excellent shots in and around London.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Very skilful.

LEADS: Fairly good.

SUPPORTS: Very good.

LITERARY: A rambling story made into a good working scenario.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Excellent

LIGHTING: Good.

EXTERIORS: Very good, indeed.

INTERIORS: Convincing.

YOUR CORNER LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

"OF MUCH BENEFIT."

I am pleased to note that you are about to commence a new feature under the heading of "Who's Where?" I consider this, personally, an excellent idea and of much benefit to directors and casting directors.

It is most essential that all the artistes who enrol themselves under this new feature should personally see that their addresses and telephone numbers are kept right up to date.

I hope to see everybody, who is anybody, registered under your new feature "Who's Where?"—H. B. PARKINSON (Managing Director, Master Films).

WHO AND WHAT?

Before discussing M. P. Prout's remarks upon the principles of the K.C.S., a few of us would like to know who and what Mr. Prout is in the cine. industry, which might also explain some of his contentions in his recent controversy on studio lighting with that able and known cameraman, Basil W. G. Emmott.—PHIL ROSS (Vice-Pres., K.C.S.).

FOURPENCE

Mr. DENISON CLIFT.

DENISON CLIFT

Shall British Pictures Be Mutilated to Serve a so-called “Commercial” View-point?

ARNOLD BENNETT'S story, "The Old Wives' Tale," adapted and produced by Denison Clift, was trade shown on December 13th. The London "Express" of December 14th criticised the picture, (1) for being "dreary" in effect, and (2) for having missed the obligatory scene which made the novel great, namely, that situation where Sophia Baines, as an old woman, confronts her husband's dead body after half a century.

The criticism of the "Express" is absolutely correct.

Facts are inexorable. The original agreed length of this picture was 6,000 ft. After completion, 750 feet were arbitrarily cut out, without consultation with the producer. These cuts ruthlessly eliminated (1) the opening light comedy, tooth-pulling scene which was one of the most charming in the novel, and was designed to contrast with the essential grimness of the end; and (2) the great obligatory scene of Sophia beholding the dead body of her husband—a scene made by the producer, and inevitably led up to as the climax and heart of the picture. The removal of these scenes leaves the screen story purposeless; they should be retained in the version that reaches the public.

However, this case of "The Old Wives' Tale" is trivial and inconsequential compared with the broad principle involved. British pictures to-day are fighting desperately for a place in the sun. England has every opportunity of achieving a glorious position. But if the work of writers and producers—men and women who have lived with their subject for weeks and months—is to be re-shaped, and all the delicate balance of dramatic values ignored—then the whole creative foundation crumbles, and without artistic achievement, commercial achievement is impossible to-day.

Getting in.

WE are able to make an exclusive announcement of the fact that Guy Newall has sold the American rights of "The Bigamist" to Robertson-Cole on percentage with a deposit of fifty-six thousand dollars against a guaranteed minimum. While we are not enamoured of the film, owing to its length and its slow action, we are glad to get this news and offer our congratulations to George Clark Productions. From the beginning of his operations Guy Newall has steadfastly tried to make good films, sparing neither time nor expense. Most of his pictures have reached a comparatively high level, and whatever may be the defects of "The Bigamist" to our eyes, it has evidently impressed America in a way in which few British films have done. When Guy Newall returns from the United States it is anticipated that he will resume producing on a larger scale. According to his own remarks before he left, he firmly believes in making them effectively. If he continues on these lines he will certainly meet with further success.

More Work.

THERE is good reason to believe that the rank and file of British artistes will find the field of their activities enlarged in the coming year. In the first place, there are definite political signs of a general trade revival, which in itself will create more confidence in our own directors. And several American companies are planning to take parts of films already scheduled in this country. In every case this will involve more employment for British artistes, for the American companies will almost certainly bring over only one or two stars and use for the rest native artistes. It is not possible to give details at the moment but one company will in all probability need over a hundred and fifty artistes and some cameramen if it holds to a decision which at the moment it is on the point of making.

The Birth of the Club!

LAST Sunday's meeting, which was very well attended and exceedingly enthusiastic, settled the last details of the Kinema Club—for this has been fixed, after much voting and protracted discussion, as its name. An executive committee has been appointed, and this in turn met on Monday, and after a three hours sitting appointed the various sub-committees which will look after the interests of the Club and its members—which up to date are well over three hundred. Several influential patrons have been secured, and a preliminary house warming is to be held on Tuesday December 27, at the Club's premises,

Is the London to re-start?

FOR some weeks reminiscent articles concerning the old days of the London Film Company have been appearing, and each of the writers has shown that he looks back with happy memory on the time when it was active. One has expressed what others no doubt also think—the hope that some day the studio will be reopened. Such a thing is perhaps not so improbable as it appears. It may even be close at hand. F. E. Adams has been in America for some time and one of the principal objects of his visit has been to try to make affiliations which will enable him to start production here on a large scale. Recently he went on to Los Angeles on the same errand. Now it is not, perhaps, making a very wild guess to suggest that if he does start it will be by reviving the London Film Company not only in active form but on an even larger and more ambitious scale than formerly. Everyone would be glad to see him do it, both for its early associations and for the new activity which it would introduce into production.

Kinema Club Notices

A Full Report of Sunday's meeting will be found on page 11. Foundation Membership at Three Guineas per annum is open until January 1, 1922. Applications should be made at once. After that date subscriptions will be raised to Five Guineas.

WILL all those willing to assist at the Informal Housewarming on December 27 kindly communicate with the Hon. Secretary.

Gifts in money and kind—furniture, pictures, curtains, etc.—are being promised and any further gifts will be greatly appreciated by the Executive Committee.

Great Newport Street, by which date two of the four floors will be decorated and furnished. It must not be forgotten that the Club owes its position to George Ridgwell. Except for his wonderful generosity and large-heartedness it would not have been possible to have brought it to its present stage, nor could any Club have secured premises on anything like the scale of those which it now possesses. If only to show appreciation for all the things which George Ridgwell has done, everyone in the producing Industry who is eligible ought to join at once. If you join before January 1 next, you will get in for three guineas. After that date the subscription will be raised to five guineas and it is not unlikely that there will also be an entrance fee. So hurry up and send in your application to the Hon. Secretary, 93, Long Acre, W.C.2.

What's in a Name?

ELSEWHERE a correspondent takes exception to referring to other than the stars in a film as "this woman" or "that man." So far as the suppression of names is concerned he is justified—artistes frequently do not get sufficient screen credit for their work. But the sentence he quotes from the previous issue he has evidently misinterpreted. It is "... and the woman who acted as the spy is another well-filled role." Now "the woman who acted as the spy" is the designation of the part and not a description of the artiste. Even if it were, there is surely what we may be excused for calling a more manly ring in the name "woman" than in that of the very much overworked "lady." And as far as the other sex is concerned, we believe that most of them prefer it.

"ALICE IN FILMLAND"

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

Hugh E. Wright, in addition to his recognised histrionic ability, is a skilled wielder of the pen. By the courtesy of the Actor we are able to reproduce, in serial form, one of Hugh's literary effusions.

CHAPTER I.

"TWINKLE, TWINKLE."

ALICE was sitting in a big cosy armchair by the fire, deep in her favourite book. As sometimes happened when she was reading this particular volume, she could never be quite certain afterwards whether she was really outside the book looking on at herself, or really inside the book being looked on at; whichever it was this time she got a most peculiar feeling.

"Curiouser, and curiouser!" she said to herself; for at that moment a round little man dashed past, with his coat tails flying out behind him, shouting out, "I've got the Sole Rights! I've got the Sole Rights!" and everything went "shivery and swimmy," as Alice expressed it, "with flickers between all the bits that weren't."

Before she had time to pull herself together—which she knew was the right thing to do, only "I'm never quite sure where the rest of me is," as she explained sadly afterwards—she found herself in a large bare building where there were a lot of men and women, with very yellow faces and very black eyes.

"And if it's China," thought Alice to herself, "I don't see how I shall ever get home, because I don't know the way, or Chinese; unless they'd understand if I made a noise like tea. Perhaps it's only biliousness, though."

She was wondering what sort of a noise tea made, when a man, rather like the Mad Hatter without the hat, but with a lot of long hair to make up for it, rushed up to her.

"What is it?" he said irritably.

"If you mean me, I'm not 'it,' I'm 'her,'" said Alice.

"I can see that," said the man. "But the question is—what is it?"

Alice wondered for a moment if the answer could possibly be a lemon, but luckily for her, perhaps, she didn't suggest it. "I'm not quite sure if I know what 'it' you mean," she said, a little doubtfully.

"There are a lot about," said the man graciously. "I suppose the biggest of them all was the 'it' I made in 'A Girl's Destiny.'"

"Oh, you made it," said Alice, a little confused.

"Made it!" said the man scornfully. "Why I was it! Absolutely IT!"

Alice felt it was all getting very difficult, but fortunately the man changed the subject. "The question is—Who are you?" he said.

"I thought the question was—'What about it?'" said Alice.

"The question is—What's your name?" said the man.

"I believe I know the answer to that," said Alice, "but the question keeps changing so."

"Nothing of the sort!" said the man.

Alice was too polite to contradict, so she thought hard for a minute, and then said: "My name's Alice."

"Alice what?" said the man.

"Just Alice!" she answered.

"Not THE Alice?" he said, peering at her curiously.

"I'm not quite sure if I'm THE Alice," said Alice conscientiously. "I am to me, of course; but any other Alice might think she was THE to her, and then I should only be one of the 'a's.'"

"That proves it," said the man triumphantly. "You're THE Alice, nobody else could have got so mixed." Alice didn't say anything, she was feeling mixed by this time. "I suppose you know we've got the Sole Rights in you—at least, Isaacson has. Got 'em very cheap, too—your copyright's lapsed, you know. I doubt if there's any money in you, though."

"I did have fourpence when I started," said Alice, feeling very bewildered.

The man laughed. "You don't understand," he said.

"I'm afraid I don't—quite," said Alice.

"I'll explain. This is the A.B.F.C.—All British Film Co., you know—Isaacson runs it. He's a Russian Jew, born in Germany, of Swiss parents; so he became a naturalised American."

"Is that why he calls it All British?" asked Alice.

"Of course!" said the man, scornfully. "Don't interrupt! He's bought you, and he'll turn you into five reels. We shall have to twist you a bit, though."

"I don't think I shall like being twisted," said poor Alice. "Must I?"

"Of course," said the man again. "Otherwise, how will they get Me in?"

"Can't they get you in without twisting me?" asked Alice. "It seems unfair. Why can't they get me in and twist you?"

"Twist Me?" cried the man in amazement. "Why, I'm the Star!"

"If only He'd been a Comet," thought Alice, "they could have twisted his tail. Well, if I've got to be twisted, I'll be twisted, but I know I shall scream. They'll have to twist me such a lot to get me on five reels, too"

The man was gazing at her. "I've got it!" he cried suddenly. "If you're the real Alice you can recite. Recite to me now."

"I think I know 'Twinkle, Twinkle,'" said Alice obligingly.

"That will do," said the man.

Alice did really think she knew it, but whether the twisting had begun without her being aware of it, or if it was that shaky feeling she had, it all seemed to come out different. This is how it sounded:—

"Twinkle, twinkle, Kine. Star,
Oh, how popular you are;
Don't you hope you'll get a rise,
Just because you advertise."

"It's a lie!" the man shouted, purple with passion. "Advertise! It's a damnable lie! Just because I've had my card in the Kine Weekly for a year or two—and then I didn't pay for more than three months." He looked at her gloomily for a minute. "THE Alice!" he muttered. "You didn't advertise, I suppose! There isn't a penny in you—not a penny!" and he stalked away.

Alice felt in her pocket, but the fourpence was still there.

"Don't take any notice of him," said a little voice in her ear.

THE LURE OF THE STUDIO

It was 6.30.

As yet the daylight had hardly arrived, but a thick, yellow fog made the lamps in the cold, dark street almost indiscernable. Few were astir; here and there a workman trudged along. Now and then a tramcar drove past with a noisy clatter. Most of the occupants of the quiet suburban street were still abed, but there was one house where a light shone in the window, and inside somebody was already astir.

It was the home of Dalia Faire, the kinema artiste.

It was still very early when Dalia dashed for the little suburban station and caught a workman's train for Blankville. The cold morning air pierced her through and through as she stepped out on to the Blankville Station.

Down the muddy road which leads to the studios Dalia tramped.

At 8.30 sharp Dalia was on the studio floor, but as yet the director had not arrived. A number of other artistes were also there, all in evening dress. The men wore spotless, starched-fronted, evening shirts and immaculate dress suits; the ladies were more scantily attired in their low-cut evening gowns.

At nine o'clock sharp the director arrived. He proceeded to give a few directions to the various stage hands, and by 9.30 all was ready for taking.

Meanwhile, Dalia waited.

By 11.30 the director had rehearsed the scene for about the hundredth time, but the two artistes who were appearing in it had not pleased him. 12.30 arrived; and still Dalia waited. Two scenes had been shot and rehearsed, but Dalia was not required in either.

She was beginning to feel chilly and miserable; the director's voice seemed to her to be one of the necessary evils of life. She heard the two artistes on the set repeat the same words they had been repeating so mechanically for the last half-hour.

Lunch consisted of roast beef, cabbage and baked potatoes, all of which was almost as cold as the surroundings; somehow or other the roast beef, cabbage and potatoes seemed familiar to her, so did the prunes and custard; and these she regarded as another one of the tortures that beset studio life.

After lunch, Dalia spent a few more hours on the floor, and by 4.30 was thoroughly miserable. 7.30 had just passed when Dalia had finished her small part in the film. She had played in a riotous feast episode, which was supposed to take place in a very bohemian café. Wine had flowed like water, but to her the cold tea, which she had consumed in gallons, was a very different thing to wine.

"You don't seem to enter into the spirit of the thing, Miss Faire," the director had told her.

By eight o'clock she had received her remuneration of one guinea, and, with portmanteau in hand, was sprinting towards Blankville Station to catch the last train home.

By ten o'clock Dalia was in bed, having arrived home just too late and too tired to go to either a show or a dance. And so she closed her eyes to hear, even in her slumber, the barking voice of the director, the bang, bang, bang of the carpenter's hammer, and the loud shout of "Quiet, please!" as the director proceeds to take.

"DOUBLE AITCH."

Intimate Studio Gossip

There appears to be a fairly comprehensive limitation of activities at the Stoll Studios. The remarkable number of rumours that are floating around contains the smallest modicum of hall-marked truth—but nothing more! Actually, so far as I am able to discover, the studio will only be used by Stoll for the Sherlock Holmes series during the winter. Maurice Elvey, I am informed, will probably direct a production of his own; Martin Thornton is open to direct productions for another firm.

* * *

Lisle Lucoque has achieved fame.

This week a Royal Command performance was given at the Wesleyan East End Mission of "Where the Rainbow Ends." Her Royal Highness congratulated Mr. Lucoque on the excellence of the production and chatted very enthusiastically to Bruce Cave-Chinn. Eric Gray, who plays an important part in the film, tells me that the Royal spectator was obviously enjoying herself.

Who will play "Peter Pan"? Sir

James Barrie is taking his time in the selection of the player, and curiosity is rife as to the identity of the artiste. But if the Daily Mail is gullible enough to believe the yarn that Sir James asked Charlie Chaplin to play the part, I'm not! I would not insult the intelligence of Sir James by suggesting it.

* * *

Elsewhere in this issue the full details of Sunday's Kinema Club meeting will be found, but I cannot refrain from congratulating the old committee on its wonderful achievement. The idea was first hatched in this office, and the credit for being the founder is due to the hon. secretary, whose efforts are crowned with such success.

* * *

of the newly formed Big Four Famous Productions, which has just commenced work at the Gaumont Studio, Shepherd's Bush, is "Potter's Clay." I was one of the party of guests who assembled last week in the studio to meet Ellen Terry, the star of the film, in which she has a very long and important part, and had the privilege of watching Miss Terry in a highly emotional scene in which, to spite her 73 years, she appeared to retain all her old dramatic qualities, so much so that the real tears came into her eyes, and she was visibly upset. In conversation afterwards, Miss Terry remarked that she thought she could say that she had one of the best parts in her career, and one which ran the gamut of every emotion. Grenville Taylor, who is directing the production, informs me that he has some exceedingly novel lighting effects in the picture.

Did you ever wonder how brain waves are waved? If so, perhaps Walter Forde's experiences will help. It is a cold morning, and Walter mounts a 'bus to go to studio. Meets his director. "Got to do a scene to-day—no ideas," says he. Walter sinks into silence and depths of overcoat—

Several directors have explained to us the difficulty they have of getting quickly into touch with artistes and others whom they need for their productions, and have suggested that we publish addresses and telephone numbers of such. Andrew Soutar is one of the most successful of our British authors in filmland. Since the filming of his novel, "The Green Orchard," in this country seven years ago, no fewer than twenty-four of his stories have been transferred to the silver sheet. Some of them have Norma Talmadge as the heroine, whilst several of his characters have been created for the film by Violet Hopson and Stewart Rome. Mr. Soutar recently visited America and made a long study of American methods—he had returned to this country determined to take an active part in British film manufacture—an ambition which will shortly be realised.

Victor Rowe arrived back in London from Glasgow last week. He has been busy up in Scotland on a two-reel comedy called "Football Daft," and the picture, which he has brought to London, has turned out quite a good comedy. Rowe built his own sets, and the studio he used only contained nine Westminsters, and when the trams passed the studio—out went the lights! Still, even labouring under such difficulties the picture has turned out remarkably good.

LOOKING THE

by CHRYSTABEL

Charlie Chaplin has stamped himself as both a clever thinker and an honest man. Among the host of American film celebrities who have recently landed in England to see and discuss our industry, he is the only one that has told his countrymen the truth that "American stars and American directors must look to their laurels." I would go further and say that American scenarists too must break away from many of their well-worn plots if their stories are to rank with the best that Europe is producing to-day.

America grants us our beautiful scenery, it grants us our literature for adaptations, but it does not acknowledge our immensely improved camera-work, our better production or any other of the advances we have recently made. America is content instead to tell us that our pictures will never appeal to them as their own national pictures do, and curiously the English and Transatlantic papers take the point of view that that necessarily closes the market to us for the expansion of our trade.

British films have got to find an outlet in the foreign market, and also to increase their home market. That is bound to come, but America is not necessarily the solution.

Let it be granted (as a Trade paper stated recently) that the United States possesses half the picture palaces of the world. The remainder may be roughly placed as being on the Continent or in the British Empire. Africa loves the kinema, and that country is capable of almost unlimited expansion for the trade. So far as I have been able to question South Africa residents, none of them had seen a British film screened in their country. Yet those kinemas are built on British soil and cater for British audiences!

English stories with English settings would mean much to our exiled men who have gone over there, and American pictures do not comfort the homesick man who is longing for the sight of the pretty scenes of the old country.

India and Canada tell the same story, and it also applies to Australia. Mr. Hughes has made the suggestion that no kinema on Australian soil should be licensed unless it showed a certain proportion of British films.

It is the fashion at the moment to forget the Empire. It should be a great asset to increase our trade. They want our pictures, and if such a rule as Mr. Hughes suggests were put into force throughout the Empire, we should not have to worry about the future of British films. Plenty of money would come pouring into the industry, and there would be no more talk about the difficulty of finding the financial backing for British super-films.

Tom Seamore has been engaged to play in "Walter Wins a Wager," a new Walter Forde subject.

W. A. Freshman has been booked through Jay's for the new Granger-Binger production, "Thou Shalt Not."

F. Martin Thornton has now completed his contract with Stoll, and will be available to direct films elsewhere immediately.

J. Stuart Blackton has promised to give a lecture to the members of the Stoll Picture Theatre Club in the near future.

OH ! WHAT A GAME

by "WYCOLLER DENE."

SOME wonderful people you see every day
Seek their living in a precarious way,
If novice or beginner you may get a start
In the kinema world by playing a part.
But artistes of standing are sometimes allowed—
If luck comes their way—to get booked for a crowd.
They regret meeting hambones, but there, dear oh lor !
They'll ne'er get a living till they close the door.

Chorus—

Oh, what a game, Oh, what a game—
Looking for movie work drives us insane.
What with the agents and money they gain—
Join in the chorus, sing oh ! what a game.

The first call we make is just by Bow Street, !
Up a few steps in an office so neat,
A young gent we meet alive in the flesh,
Whose usual remarks are that "There is nothing fresh."

Then off up to Bramlins with hope in our soul,
Only to be told we're "too young or too old—
You are not what we wanted," the usual remark,
Then, like little Peter, you're left in the dark.

In Wardour Street, artistes you meet every day
Who climb flights of stairs to see Mr. Jay,
He only wants types and—"no more to-day."
Then this is the Chorus you sing in dismay.

Walter Forde is using Stoll's Cricklewood Studio for the making of his new film, "Walter Wins a Wager."

Joe Bamberger and Walter Forde are responsible for the direction of the new Walter Forde production, "Walter Wins a Wager."

Clive Brook is now appearing in "Clothes and the Woman" at the Ambassadors, having returned to the stage after an absence of two years. He has some important film contracts to fulfil, and is also open to other offers.

Milton Rosmer, by arrangement with Stoll, is free to accept engagements with other producing concerns. He is to play Harry Latimer in the stage play, "The Rattlesnake," so soon as C. B. Cochran can get a West End theatre.

Amy Verity has finished work with Ideal.

Pollie Emery is playing in the new Artistic comedies.

John Stuart has nearly finished work in "Sinister Street" with Ideal.

YOUR CORNER

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THE CAP THAT DOES NOT FIT.

It has come to my knowledge that several prominent people in the film industry have associated my name with a paragraph which appeared recently in your journal concerning an agent who is associated with a certain cinema school.

I wish to point out that I am not, and never have been, associated in any way with any cinema school, and will not, in any circumstances, engage any pupils from such establishments.

I am very much against these schools, and have always openly expressed my opinion of them.—SIDNEY JAY.

 It should be made perfectly clear that Mr. Jay's name was not, directly or indirectly, associated with this paragraph, which contained nothing to cause him to imagine that we connected him with the school in question.—ED.

NAMES OF CAST.

"—and the woman who acted as the spy is another well-filled role."

May I take the above title, which is a short extract from your "Screen Values" page of last week's issue of THE MOTION PICTURE STUDIO, as being sufficient reason, or excuse, for the following remarks. In the first instance, the artiste referred to in this particular paragraph, and I may state I have not the remotest idea whom she may be, was obviously considered to be worthy of her part, or she would never have been allocated to it; and, furthermore, it is quite obvious that she performed the part successfully, or the critic would not have voiced his approbation; therefore, is it not an insult to such an artiste to be designated as "this woman" or "that man" when receiving a fully merited appreciation of work well done.

With all due respect I would like to submit to the powers that be in the British film producing industry, that it would not only be equitable, but a great encouragement to the artistes, if the names of every artiste playing a part was mentioned in the cast, either at the commencement of the film, or, better still, immediately prior to the artiste's first appearance.

The critics and public would then know who was doing the good work. This custom is carried out very satisfactorily in most of the best American films, and I feel sure that most people will agree that the prevailing habit of referring to all except the two star artistes, as "this woman" or "that man," played "so and so," etc., is certainly not in keeping with the best British traditions of fair play and equity.—BOOKSBANK WALTER.

QUERIES ANSWERED.

The vice-president of the K.C.S. appears to be willing to discuss my article if I will answer the question "Who are you?"

As the article does not, as far as I am concerned, need further discussion, I cannot see any object in satisfying the curiosity of a few by answering a question which I consider to be lacking in pertinence.

Knowledge is not a monopoly of the best known in any industry, and this is particularly true of a new industry, and one, such as the Kinematographic, in which self-advertisement and ability do not run hand in hand.

If Mr. Ross is minded to try and refute the substance of my article it would doubtless interest some readers of THE MOTION PICTURE STUDIO. He would thus, I think, the better occupy his time than by dealing in personalities.

Basil Emmott took exception to something I had written, but my little discussion with him ended in a quite healthy and amicable difference of opinion. He wrote as one conversant with his subject, and he wrote with courtesy. Nor did he seem to require any championing.—M. P. PROUT.

AROUND THE (STUDIO) TOWN

No. 2.—STOLL STUDIOS, CRICKLEWOOD

It is generally acknowledged that the British producing profession is greatly in need of publicity. Most of the picturegoing public has had peeps at the wonderfully equipped American studios, and now "Around the Town" has taken in hand to show picturegoers something of the big English studios.

A recent visit to Cricklewood resulted in the "Around the Town," cameramen securing a number of unique shots of some of the Stoll directors at work.

George Ridgwell was photographed at work on one of the new Sherlock Holmes series, with Alfred Moses, his cameraman, and Hubert Willis and Eille Norwood on the set.

Maurice Elvey, Madge Stuart, Mlle.

Top centre : Madge Stuart and Mlle. Valia in the dressing-room.

Valia, Ian Beverley, Milton Rosmer and other well-known members of the Stoll staff were shown at work on "The Passionate Friends."

British picture audiences cannot fail to be impressed with these little peeps at the largest and, perhaps, best equipped studio in England. The different methods of the various directors in getting a scene shot properly, and the little intimate touches, which show the Stoll stars as they are when not at work, are included.

After having seen behind the scenes, picturegoers will be anxious to see the actual finished product, and it must necessarily add greatly to the popularity the Stoll productions to have these advance publicity agents on the job so early. In the same way it should help every film company interviewed, and it therefore follows that the British picture industry will, to a great extent, benefit by allowing the public to get a glimpse of how it is done, to say nothing of the effect it must have on the financial market to show such highly equipped studios. "Around the Town" show these at all the most enterprising kinemas throughout the country.

AN ACCOMPLISHED FACT

THE FIRST BRITISH STUDIO CLUB LAUNCHED

There was no doubting the enthusiasm with which the Kinema Club is being received. One glance at the meeting on Sunday last was sufficient to convince anyone that the Club is a huge success. The meeting was well attended, and a great deal of business was negotiated during the afternoon.

George Ridgwell, who was elected as chairman for the afternoon, characterised the meeting as a christening, as one of the duties for the afternoon was to give the Club a suitable name.

This, he reminded those present, was the first official meeting of the Club. There had been a previous meeting, but at the time the club did not possess any members.

The secretary read the minutes of the previous meeting, and gave a report of the Club's financial position. He stated that the Club owed a debt of gratitude to George Ridgwell who had advanced £1,000, being the first year's rent and rates for the Club premises. In thanking him, the secretary said that it was entirely due to Mr. Ridgwell that the premises had been secured.

There were no less than 283 full members, two honorary members, and 15 associate members, making a total membership of 300. Associate membership is confined to bona fide kinema journalists, and welded in their number are representatives of the Kinematograph Weekly, Bioscope, Cinema, Daily Mail, Daily Express, Sunday Chronicle, Weekly Dispatch, Pictures and MOTION PICTURE STUDIO.

Five months ago the matter of a Club was first mooted in the STUDIO, and a committee got together to formulate a scheme, with the result that the Club would be open at Christmas.

As it is intended that an outside caterer should supply the lunches, the only expenses in running the Club will be the staff. Excellent kitchen accommodation is provided on the top floor, and is connected by a goods lift to all the floors, so that meals can be sent down quickly.

The premises are situated at 8-9, Great Newport Street, almost opposite the Leicester Square tube station. The builders are already in, and two floors will be opened on December 27.

The general lounge and dining room is situated on the first floor. On the second floor is the bar and billiard room. The third floor is set aside for the ladies, and the fourth floor contains a card room and the kitchen.

Before finishing his report, the secretary appealed for all members to pay their subscriptions immediately.

George Ridgwell then spoke of the great amount of hard work that the temporary committee had been putting in. The temporary committee had all the data at its finger tips, and when the new committee was being elected, he would have liked to have seen some of the old committee elected. But some wished to retire, and new blood was therefore wanted. He regarded the Executive Committee as the engine of the Kinema Club motor. It is the Executive that elects the sub-committees. There were twelve on the committee, excluding the president, vice-presidents, and secretary.

Max Freeman, replying to the chairman's remarks, said that the members could not express their thanks sufficiently for what the committee had done. Nobody knew the amount of work the committee had been putting in, but it could easily be guessed by the result that had been achieved. He asked the present committeemen to remain in office, but to enlarge the committee, so that new blood could also be installed.

It was pointed out that a small committee was not nearly so unwieldy as a large one, and it was therefore decided to keep the number of committeemen to twelve, and elect the various sub-committees.

The newly elected Executive Committee is composed of the president, vice-president, chairman, honorary secretary-treasurer, honorary solicitor, Arthur Walcott, Rex Davis, Dorothy Fane, Adeline Hayden Coffin, Harley Knoles, Maurice Elvey, Kate Gurney, Adrian Brunel, Alfred Moses, I. Roseman, Bernard Bromhead, L. B. Lestocq.

Members of the sub-committee elected for the Christmas opening were: Nora Ridgwell, Kate Gurney, Maud Yates, Adeline Hayden Coffin, Irene and Audrey Ridgwell, Mercy Hatton, Lallie Forsyth, Dorothy Fane, Cahana Catton.

The House Committee has for its members, Francis Duguid, Fred Groves, Lallie Forsyth, Harding Steerman, Max Freeman, Maud Yates, Flora Le Breton, Charles Vane.

Members of the Rules Committee are: Alfred Moses, Bertram Burleigh, Harding Steerman, Cyril Percival, Dorothy Fane, Thelma Murray, Frank Dane.

The Social and Entertainments Committee is made up of the following: Harry Worth, Dick Webb, Reginald Fox, Rex Davis, John Payne, Alec Fraser, Dorothy Fane, Adeline Hayden Coffin, Cahana Catton, Thelma Murray.

Members of the Sports Committee are: Cyril Smith, Geoffrey Wilmer, Victor McLaglan, Warwick Ward, Kenneth Gordon, Flora Le Breton, Eva Llewelyn.

The following have been elected on to the Ladies' Committee: Dorothy Fane, Kate Gurney, Adeline Hayden Coffin, Maud Yates, Norah Ridgwell, Lallie Forsyth, Cahana Catton, Irene Tripod, Madge Tree, Mrs. Hubert Willis.

The Selection Committee contains: Cyril Smith, Kenneth Gordon, Geoffrey Wilmer, L. B. Lestocq, George Pearson, John Gliddon, Peggy McCall, Dorothy Fane, Mrs. Hubert Willis.

George Ridgwell said that when first the Club was suggested, he was rather against it. He had had some experience with the Screen Club of America. The Screen Club started off with a great noise, but came to a sudden end. Everyone was allowed into the Screen Club, and eventually the directors broke away, and formed a club of their own; then the artistes broke away, and left the club a wreck. Profiting by this experience the Kinema Club had set out to make its membership very select. But it discovered that it was being too select, and that in excluding many worthy members of the trade it was offending them. The committee therefore advised that the membership be thrown open to all who are engaged on the production of British pictures under the following heads: Directors, assistant directors, art directors, artistes, scenarists, scenario editors, camera men, studio managers, casting directors, authors of books that have been filmed, heads of studio departments, technical directors, location managers, and managing directors of producing firms. All applications to be subject to passing the Qualification Committee.

This was passed unanimously

There were still a number of people in the profession who had not joined the Club; while not asking the members to start touting, the chairman hoped that they would all bring a number of prospective members along to the Christmas opening. He had little doubt that when these prospective members saw the premises, they would join up with the others. Of course, these visitors would have to come under the heading of one of the particular sides of the profession stipulated for, and would have to pass the Selection Committee.

It was proposed that the present rate of £3 3s. entrance be extended until January 1, 1922. This was agreed to.

Col. Bromhead, A. E. Newbould, M.P., and Jeffrey Bernard, are the elected vice-presidents.

George Ridgwell remarked that many clubs, bigger and better than the Kinema Club, were being worried with finance. For many weeks the Kinema Club had been worried by the subject of finance, until he was suddenly struck with a brain wave.

In America all the leading actors belong to the Lambs Club, and their method of keeping the club going is to have an annual show each year, with all the big stars playing in it. He thought that it would be quite possible for the Kinema Club, which already contained most of the leading artistes, directors, camera men, scenarists, etc., to make a production on similar lines. The studio, he had arranged to have free, and he had been promised financial backing for the first picture, besides a promise of £1,500 profit. When this scheme materialises the Club will be independent, and will be able to start a Benevolent Fund.

He concluded by asking for the wholehearted support of every member. He wanted them to give the Club all their support, and to go to the committee with any suggestions.

It was decided to call the Club "The Kinema Club."

After a vote of thanks had been given, it was pointed out that as only one film would be made a year, the production would in no way compete with the usual British productions being made.

We are asked to urge all those who come in the qualifications categories enumerated above, and who desire to join the Club, to send in a written application at once to the Hon. Secretary (temporary address), 93, Long Acre, W.C.2. Also it is hoped that each member will become a recruiting sergeant and enlist members. Already L. B. Lestocq has got busy, and the F. P.-Lasky Studios. In addition to roping in several leading members of the staff, he has exhibited the following notice in the waiting room:—

"THE KINEMA CLUB.

If you are not a member become one NOW and save money. I can give you full particulars.—L. B. Lestocq."

"It is thrown out as a suggestion that studio heads do the same at every studio.

NOTE.—Members and others are requested not to take tours of investigation over the premises yet as the builders are working against time, and little delays all mount up.

REMINISCENCES OF THE OLD LONDON

Anyone who has watched the British industry grow cannot fail to have been impressed with the fact that the industry has been considerably affected for the good by the work of the Old London Film Company. We are therefore inviting those who were connected with the London to send in reminiscences of those good and important days.

by HAROLD BASTICK

Looking back at those old days at the London we cannot help wishing that they were here again. That studio seems to have had an atmosphere of its own, and we all seemed rather a big happy family pulling together with but one object in view, than the staff of the then largest and best equipped British studio.

At the same time I am inclined to think that we were all looked upon by the "outside world" as rather a prize bunch of priceless fanatics.

In those far off days, who had ever heard of building a solid set, and even wall-papering it, merely to be pulled down immediately after being used for perhaps only a few minutes?

Waste of money! Idiotic!

But nevertheless, who does not do it now?

THE CENSORSHIP BLUES

by PETER PEPPER

Beautiful moonlight—garden scene—

A close-up warm with Life.

Tender tale of a plighted troth

Sans sorrow and sans strife.

And a little room where censors sit

And cut

And cut

And cut.

Wonderful girls in bathing suits

Frolicing on the beach.

Thundering surf and laughing winds—

A scene your heart to reach.

And a sombre place where censors stalk

And clip

And clip

And clip.

Two-fister men in corduroy

Fighting—as real men will—

Out in the heart of the silent woods.

Fighting a bull to kill!

And a gloom-filled hole where censors strut

And chop

And chop.

I remember one such instance when the late George Loane Tucker was producing "Arsene Lupin," in which, among others, Duggie Munro, Frank Stanmore, Gerry Ames, Ken Foss, Lewis Gilbert, Manora Thew, and Dolly Tree, were playing, and on which Ernie Palmer, Gustave Pauli, and myself, were turning.

Tucker had a great idea (he usually had two or three a day), but this one, however, was a "special," and what is now known as a "dissolve—flash-back." Its purpose was to give an opportunity to Arsene Lupin (Gerry Ames) to air his views on the origin of theft, and to more or less justify it!

An African jungle was to be the setting, complete with three men-monkeys, one woman, and one child monkey; after deciding that it was impracticable to go to the jungle, Tucker said, "Bring the jungle to me!"

Good enough! After three weeks' feverish work in all departments general and the property rooms, and carpenter shops in particular, our jungle was ready to be set.

One Friday night the four sets standing in the studio were struck, and the following Monday morning their place was taken by one of the finest and most elaborate exterior settings that it has ever been my lot to behold in any studio, even to the present day. Trees (dozens of them, more than fifteen feet in girth) with gnarled roots twisting everywhere, tangled undergrowth, bamboos, undulations of the ground, a swamp, with its characteristic dank rising mist of the tropics (supplied by perforated steam pipes from the heating boilers, I believe), and dozens of cartloads of dead leaves and clay, occupied the whole of the studio floor space.

Then the real victims of Tucker's brain-wave (Lewis Gilbert, Frank Stanmore, Dolly Tree, and the kiddie) had to submit to the ordeal (I use their own words) of being transformed to monkeys. The usual costumiers' masks and skins were not good enough for G. L. T., so each of the little band of martyrs to the Art was first of all dyed brown all over, then had much nose paste affixed to his or her face, and finally had crepe hair stuck all over the body with spirit gum.

This, of course, took hours to put on, but as any of them would have told you, days to take off!

But the man who later was to direct the "Miracle Man," was satisfied, so what mattered even if the set did cost about £300 to build and only lasted for three minutes on the screen?

As far as my own department (the photographic) was concerned, we camera men had everything we could wish for, the very best of cameras, plenty of lights, easy methods of manipulating them (which at the time was rather the exception than the rule), and a splendid factory and darkrooms.

I can only say in conclusion that I always hope that some day the powers that be will see their way to re-open the studio, in which, with its pleasant memories of such great directors as George Loane Tucker and Harold Shaw, and such great artistes as the late Charlie Rock, and its memories of hard work, combined with good friendship. I spent the happiest days of the whole of my twelve years' career as a camera man.

A SHILLING STORY

Have you noticed Sid Jay's watch-chain? I expect you have.

Kenelm Foss wandered into Jay's office with a dejected look on his face. He was casting "A Romance of Old Bagdad," and wanted a man after Matheson Lang's type to play lead.

"Why not get Lang himself to play the part?" asked Jay, and then followed a short argument, which ended in Jay betting Foss a shilling that he would fix Lang. It turned out more difficult than Jay had believed. Since his appearance in "Carnival" Lang has been inundated with offers for screen work, but he has refused them all, as he is busy with the legitimate stage at present.

Jay's first appeal was turned down, and then for two days Jay was to be seen hanging round the stage door of the New Theatre, where "Christopher Sly" is being presented. Little by little he carried on his work, and eventually, after a great deal of argument, he succeeded in fixing Lang for the part.

Jay was presented with the shilling he had won from Foss, and it is now to be seen dangling from his watch-chain—a relic of the engagement.

SCREEN VALUES

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"Because."

Edith Mellor Production.

THE old idea of getting a picture over, on the title of a well-known novel, will not help this production.

There has been very little attention given to many smaller details, which might have helped the picture a great deal. Most of the characters are very artificial. The whole production is very amateurish, and it is evident that little care has been given to it.

* * *

The acting is up to the standard of the production. The names of the artistes have been omitted from the cast, but most of them do very little above the ordinary.

* * *

The story is not the least bit true to life, and is not sufficiently interesting to hold the attention.

The photography is bad in most places, but there are times when it improves a little.

"Tansy."

Hepworth. Starring Alma Taylor. Directed by Cecil M. Hepworth. Scenario by George Dewhurst.

WHEN the world history of motion pictures comes to be written it will be found that Hepworth has done more for familiarising other countries with the natural beauties of British scenery than anyone else. "Tansy" is a case in point.

Not that "Tansy" is a super scenic. It also possesses good dramatic values. And its story is the basis of a good film entertainment. But there is an all-pervading sense of natural beauty; the essential British form of uncultivated scenic art. This is not its chief characteristic, but it certainly is the centre of its circumference.

"Tansy" is a testimony to the skill in direction. There is a cohesion in the production that can only suggest that the director has worked hand-in-hand with his scenarist and cameraman. Where there are very occasional defects it is where one or other of this triumvirate has emphasised one aspect at the expense of the others, as in those moments when good drama is turned into faulty melodrama.

George Dewhurst has evidently provided a good working scenario based on a story that is so simple that at times it is in danger of becoming thin.

* * *

Walton has now become the home of a group of players whose reputation can always bear the test of fresh work, and in this their latest work they each live well up to that reputation, and in some cases add to their laurels.

Alma Taylor is perfect—there is no other word capable of describing her work. She evidences a sympathetic insight into the real-life character of the person she represents, and throughout the whole course of the production is the dominating personality.

Jimmie Carew plays opposite her, and never falters in his clever portrayal.

Hugh Clifton has a grasp of his part which not only gives him confidence, but stamps his performance with the mark of high quality.

Rolf Leslie is well up to the high standard of artistry set by the lead, and both George Dewhurst and Teddy Royce submit portrayals which are beyond reproach.

* * *

The cameraman scores a triumph. The scenic value of the production is considerably enhanced by his technical skill; the quality of the photography is superlative and of a pleasing softness of tone rather than hard or harsh.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Very skilful and intelligent.

LEAD: A perfect performance.

SUPPORTS: All very creditable.

LITERARY: Story not too robust; scenario good.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Perfect.

LIGHTING: Good.

EXTERIORS: Beautiful.

INTERIORS: Good.

"Football Daft."

Broadway. Starring Jimmy Brough.

Directed by Victor W. Rowe. Scenario

by Jas. H. Milligan.

THIS is a two-reel Scottish domestic comedy, and as such is quite good.

It possesses a story and atmosphere which is peculiarly Caledonian, a fact that may somewhat narrow its appeal.

To the director is due considerable credit for transferring to the screen such a measure of realism as "Football Daft" possesses, while the scenes at the football match have been secured with clarity and a due sense of their comedy values.

"Old Wives' Tale."

Ideal.—Directed by Denison Clift.

Starring Henry Victor, Fay Compton, and Florence Turner.—Scenario by Denison Clift.—Photographed by Geoffrey Parkas.

Denison Clift's new production bears very little resemblance to the story given in the book. There is very little interest in the film, which is really a series of well-directed and grouped pictures. Denison Clift has directed the picture well.

* * *

Florence Turner gives one of the best performances, but she would have been better suited for the role played by Fay Compton.

Henry Victor gives another fine performance which at times is really brilliant.

Fay Compton is good, without being remarkable.

* * *

The continuity within each episode is good, but the connecting link with each episode is not good, being in most cases merely a sub-title.

* * *

Geoffrey Parkas has had some fine photographic opportunities and has secured some fine "shots."

SUPPORTS: Adequate.

LITERARY: Continuity on the whole up to standard.

ON WRITING SCENARIOS

I.—ADVICE TO THE ASPIRANT

by GERTRUDE M. ALLEN

Much creative talent has found a medium of expression in the film studio. The producer, the actor, the scenic artist, the camera expert—all are finding in the film world a lucrative and satisfying means of encouraging their art. But there is one particular corner of this vast and verdant field of dramatic expression which, in spite of the kinema's amazing progress of the last few years, still remains practically untenanted, and certainly sadly neglected.

Where are the screen authors?

A perusal of a list of, say, the latest twenty films produced in England and America will reveal the fact that at least fifteen of the twenty are "adaptations" of well-known novels or plays. This revelation is eloquent proof of the dearth of original scenario writers.

The most forcible argument made by those men and women who are endowed with fertile imaginations, and the ability to express their creations in black and white, is that the writing of a film play is a complicated, technical and difficult process, to which much study and time must be devoted before the necessary knowledge is attained.

But may not this self-same argument be made in regard to any specialised profession? No matter to what an unusual extent a novelist, a painter, a doctor, a lawyer, a dramatist or an actor is endowed with natural ability, each and all must devote the necessary months (or years) of apprenticeship and study to their calling before they are qualified to adopt it.

The screen is shouting out for stories; stories written for it—stories meant for interpretation through that medium only; stories that will leave the novel to its rightful mission—the entertainment of readers.

And for the man or woman who, blessed with a creative mind, a lucid (but not necessarily brilliant) pen, and good visionary powers, screen authorship is work which will prove not only fascinating—but remunerative.

When the rudiments of the art have been conquered (and that is the only extent to which the writer can hope to be helpful) the potential scenarist will soon discover whether he is justified in devoting time to the construction of a scenario. Fundamentally, the weavers of film-plots must be able to think in pictures. That useful asset of the literateur—dialogue, is worth practically nothing to the scenario writer. A picture play is told in action, and a perfectly dazzling pen can only give vent to its brilliance in the sub-titles of a scenario. The less there are of these, the nearer to perfection is the picture play! Have you ever sat through a film which, in spite of good acting, elaborate "settings" and technically perfect production, has only succeeded in irritating you? The repeated projection on the screen of long, explanatory titles has this disturbing effect on the spectator, and the real cause of the trouble is a badly written scenario.

Primarily, therefore, you must decide whether you possess the necessary faculty for visualising a story.

I recommend a sure and easy method of arriving at a decision on this point. Go to a first-class picture house (not the sort that run three "features" in two hours) and quietly digest the story of the "big" picture. Then wait until it is projected again, and make a note of the few sub-titles you will find in the first part. Having seen this single reel through, go home and make your version of this part of the story, with the aid of the titles you have copied. If you can evolve a concise, intelligible translation of this part of the story, using no dialogue but that contained in the titles, you possess the power of visualisation.

A technically perfect scenario is an amazingly complicated and awesome thing to gaze on. Where a stage play that provides three hours' entertainment is often set in three scenes, a photoplay which takes less than two hours to project on the screen invariably contains three hundred scenes.

In spite of this, it is not difficult to acquire a knowledge of the mechanism of a scenario.

In subsequent articles that will appear in this series, I shall deal with all the problems that will confront the would-be screen author. They include the choice of a theme, the analysis of a scenario, the function of the subtitle, writing for and around an individual artiste, "placing" finished photoplays, rates of remuneration, etc.

I repeat that the screen is "shouting for stories," that directors are only too willing to consider "possible" ones, whether submitted by unknown or famous writers, that in this much-neglected "vacancy" the successful candidate to going to reap a rich reward, both in hard cash and in the creation of a "name."

VILLAIN

by OLAF HYTTEN

I am a villain.

And I thoroughly enjoy being one, or rather being every kind of villain. No sort of villainy comes amiss to me, I am so practised a ruffian. Silent screen, or spoken drama, it is all one, I can be as big a villain on either.

Why do I like it?

I will tell you. I like playing the villain because he is usually the only man in a story with any "meat" to him. He is hot-blooded and hefty-handed, or he is cold-blooded and calculating. He may be a mass of knobbly muscle and brawn, or a tight-skinned little hypocrite; but anyway he is alive.

It is my firm conviction that authors loose all their own pent-up evil passions in their villains. They get so tired creating good-looking, sober-minded, sweet thinking, kind, love-sick, unhappy heroes, that in the reaction from this sort of thing they let themselves go a bit, and the result is a real villain with a punch.

That is what really gets me—the punch. I like to play a part with a "punch" in it. I do not necessarily mean a physical punch, although more often than not it comes to that before the finish.

Of course a villain must be resigned to being unpopular; he is hissed at by the gallery and sneered at by the stalls, but his sun will never set because he is an indispensable contrast to the angel-hearted hero. I do not mind being hissed; I know that deep down in his soul the galleryite is a perfect chivalrous gentleman, and the louder he hisses me the better I know my work to be. I am always pursuing innocent heroines with evil intent, and "Mr. Chivalry" in the gallery would give his week's wages to be able to flop down on to the stage and frustrate my wicked wiles.

In "Sonia," one of my latest pictures, I am a proper villain. I lure the heroine from her broken down car by the roadside into an hotel, and there I have a great set-to with her.

I remember on one occasion being introduced to a very charming young lady who had heard all about my (stage and screen) villainous career. She looked fearfully at me and talked timidly about the weather. Presently she plucked up courage and asked diffidently: "Does playing so many villains have any effect upon you? I mean do you think you are a worse man now than you were before you ever acted a villain at all?" What could I say? I just told her that my nearest relations still allowed me to live with them, and let her hope the best she could. How do I know what a perfect hero I might have blossomed into if only I had never become a perfect villain?

TRIBUTES TO CAMERAMEN

Here is a remarkable tribute which appeared recently in the New York Globe in which every cameraman should be interested:—

To those on the inside the real hero of the filmed drama or comedy is the cameraman. There is probably no other profession to-day which can guarantee as many thrills to the second as that of grinding the camera while the stellar players register heavy emotion as they fall off a cliff or perform some other highly artistic moving picture feat.

The cameraman is the man behind the thrills. He is the modest and determined gentleman who glues himself to the side of an unsympathetic cliff and "shoots" the star as he jumps into a waiting net below. If the cameraman falls from his perch he will be met on his arrival at the bottom by a welcoming committee consisting of one large rock escorted by a million stars.

The cameraman is the gentleman who, in filming a storm at sea, constructs a platform on the side of a rolling ship and in this perilous position "shoots" the struggling hero with his life belt and his heroine both clasped in his arms. The hero gets a large salary and a lot of applause when the picture is shown. The cameraman gets a ducking if he slips from his reeling platform, a reprimand for spoiling so much film, and a chance to do it all over again at some future time.

Many of the cameramen have become, within the profession, the most romantic figures of the Industry. Legends of their heroism and courage under the most trying conditions have grown up about these men until they have become almost super-figures of heroic qualities.

The green player, unused to the startling ways of the movies, is awed by these veterans of courage as he enters the profession. The older and sensible stars regard him as a good friend and a wise counsellor, and frequently seek his advice on film questions entirely removed from the mechanical act of "shooting" the picture.

One story is told of the cameraman who stood poised on the wing of an airplane and "shot" a cavern scene on a mountain side which could not be photographed in any other manner. The players had slid down the side of the mountain to reach this particular cave so that the cameraman could take the picture there.

The only way the scene could be taken was by a quick flash from a passing plane. Certainly this was not an arm-chair assignment, but to the cameraman involved it was all part of the day's work and accomplished without comment or protest of any kind.

When the film hero in his speeding car hits a sharp curve at seventy miles an hour, remember that another car ahead with a cameraman standing in its swaying tonneau has hit that curve ahead of the popular hero; a cameraman is going through stunts just as thrilling and hazardous, and that his return in the way of both monetary reward and personal satisfaction is not nearly as great.

COME RIGHT IN!

If you are passing, or if you want to ask a question, or if you have some news, or if you want to have a chat over the business—come right in! We are anxious to maintain close personal touch with all our readers. We are putting you first all the time—you and your interests are our chief concern, and we want to emphasise that you have a perfect right to come in and regard our time as being at your disposal. Come right in!

MARY PICKFORD'S BRITISH CAMERAMAN

CHARLES C. ROSHER

It is a number of years ago since Charles Gladdish Rosher left England, but he recently paid a flying visit to London on his way from America to Italy. Rosher was educated at Howard Farmer's School of Photography, The Polytechnic, Regent Street, London.

After some minor experiences, including Press photography, Rosher went to Speaight's, Ltd., of Bond Street, W., as assistant operator, and soon became chief operator, and took complete charge of the Speaight Studio Galleries, during the absence of Richard Speaight.

Having other ambitions and wanting to see more of the world, he decided to try America, and left England in the fall of 1908. He then decided to go in for the movies, and spent about a year on 101 Ranch, picturing cowboys and Indians. In turn he acted as cameraman to Gene Gautier, Pathé, The Victory Co., etc., and was in charge of six other cinematographers in Mexico under General Villa, and photographed the battle of Ojinaga.

When C. De Mille became a director of Lasky's, Rosher was selected as his photographer, and has since photographed all his productions. For the last four years he has been with Mary Pickford, for whom he photographed "Daddy Long Legs," "The Heart of the Hills," "Polyanna," "Suds," and "Little Lord Fauntleroy."

He is 36 years of age, a Charter Member and first Vice-President of the American Society of Kinematographers, and President of the first Motion Picture Camera Club.

CAMERAMEN'S NAMES

by EMILE LAUSTE

In a recent issue of the STUDIO, under "Cameramen at Work," I saw a member of the K.C.S. inquires why the names of Cameramen were only occasionally mentioned?

True, as you mention, the film reviewer

OUR FIRST.

Next issue will be our First XMAS NUMBER.

Send your Greetings through its columns.
For rates apply this Office.

is a busy man; but the oversight of mentioning cameramen's names could easily be corrected by consulting "The Pulse of the Studio," especially if the title of the film is known.

The suggestion, that making it a point of specifying the same in contract, is good; but that does not help those cameramen who hold their position solely on merit and ability—who have no contract.

So we must look to another probable cause if one's employer does not see fit to insist on it appearing—either on film or program. Is it that the renter who purchases the film as well as the exhibitor (apart from time taken up in showing several times a day) holds the possible view that it does not count—has no value?

True the artiste who stars in the production is the chief factor—after the title of film. The director's name should figure prominently also—as to him belongs the honour of everything that is entailed in making a successful production

It is well-known that every director has a different modus operandi—has it ever occurred to anybody that the cameramen rank second to directors in their art?

We have kinema fans who follow their favourite artiste.

We have critical audiences who follow their favourite director.

Who knows? We may have photographic amateurs in the audience who follow cameramen to try to learn new artistic means of improving their snapshots.

Therefore why omit one name from the trinity which counts in the finished film the public see? This trinity is:—Director—Artiste—Cameraman.

American films invariably state "Photography by John Smith." Have they found that it has a value? It would be interesting to know.

The Club and the Future.

ALREADY, encouraged by the success which is attending the formation of the Kinema Club, members are making suggestions for future developments. In our "High Lights" feature Adrian Brunel puts forward an idea for lectures by specialists in various branches of the Industry and at the same time pays a striking tribute to our associated paper, the Kine. There is no doubt that the Club, at a later stage in its growth, can become the centre of artistic development, technical education and general improvement, to say nothing of its possibilities in such more remote matters as research. The formation of a benevolent fund, provision of legal assistance and advice, and the creation of a standardised form of contract (in some such manner as the V.A.F. secured the Award Contract) are not outside the scope of the Club's possibilities if it is loyally supported and properly upheld.

Don't Knock; Come In.

TALKING of loyal support brings up a vital point. Always in any new movement there are, either inside or out, some "knockers." The genuine critic, who raises questions with a view of clearing up or preventing difficulties, is to be welcomed. But the grumbler, who merely picks holes because he must have something to find fault with, is both a menace and a nuisance. Surely if you want to help the Club—which means in the long run helping the profession and yourself—you can by a little thought realise the enormous work that has already been accomplished, the great difficulties that have been overcome and the time and energy which a few enthusiasts have willingly sacrificed to the scheme. Nothing is ever done perfectly, and there is not a single member of the Committee which has so far shouldered all the burden who would claim that there are no imperfections in what has so far been achieved. But there are a few grumblers—and their grumbling is all the more insidious because it is not done openly for the purpose of helping. What we say to them is this: In this Club there has already been achieved what had never been accomplished in the British Film Industry before. If you cannot or will not assist do not obstruct. Be helpful or be silent. In short, be in and of the Club or keep out and let us get on with our task unhampered.

The "Fourth Wall."

E. A. BAUGHAN, one of the first of the better-class critics to take serious and intelligent notice of the photoplay, recently wrote, in the course of an the footlights, and that it is removed so that the audience can see what is going on. Film acting forces this recollection because an artiste may not look at the camera—a condition which materialises the wall which on the stage is not visible. There are, of course, other factors such as restraint and repose which are developed by film acting but the realisation of the existence of the "fourth wall" is the greatest lesson which some stage players have to learn from screen acting.

For Committee Members Only.

THIS advice lifted and adapted from some notes on another subject in the Kine, is heartily commended to the consideration of members of the Kinema Club's various Committees! When you talk at meetings, when anyone else talks, examine carefully what is said and inquire of yourself whether it contributes anything to the general interest or the particular question. Quite a lot of talking is talking, nothing else. It puts forth no new thoughts—in fine, it makes no contribution to the general welfare. It is from that point of view that all that is said in the near

ROME was not built in a day Neither was ROMA But the former achieved something in History and the latter (Max of that ilk) hopes to achieve something in the coming year and in wishing Producers, Artistes and all friends the article on stage and film acting, that "experience of film-work would do some of our stage-players a world of good. It would cure them once and for all of exaggerated grimaces in the place of natural expression, and if it only resulted in banishing those glances at the dress circle, which are one of the traditions of our acting, the course would have had its value." It is a fact that in many cases an artiste does return to the stage, after a long spell of screen acting, a more finished actor or actress and the reason is because they have learned, perhaps unconsciously, while playing for the pictures, of the existence of the "fourth wall." The habit of playing to the audience, of which Mr. Baughan and others have so often complained, could not exist if artistes would remember that there is an invisible fourth wall above future in committee meetings must be examined. Let us have a slogan in the Club and let it be: "What is your contribution?" And if there is no contribution for the Club's good, sit still and shut up!

Just to Wish You —

ALL the old good wishes for Christmas and the coming New Year. This is the first time The Motion Picture Studio has had an opportunity of doing so, for it is its first Christmas. But it does so heartily, in the hope that all you wish yourself may come true, that all your good resolutions will be kept just as long as you want to keep them, and that 1921 will see you prosper—star in, direct or "turn" more really good pictures than ever before. For the support and assistance which we have received we thank all.

WHAT'S WRONG?

by CRISTABEL LOWNDES YATES.

Directly one talks to a member of the public on the subject of the films, one discovers a real desire for English pictures—something a little different from the same old things that we are getting so tired of on the screen. If you go to the exhibitors—who live by showing pictures—they say, "But there are no great British pictures. There has never been a British super film!"

If you go to the directors and the heads of great film firms and ask them why they do not make super films and big productions that will compel attention by their very importance, they will tell you it is all a question of money. The financiers who are asked to put £30,000 or £40,000 into a big film, have to see a reasonable chance of getting their money back with a reasonable profit over and above. They must not speculate; they have got to back a certainty. If you are going to sink a big sum in a super film it means locking up a great deal of money, and where is there a market for British films at present big enough for them to get their money back, let alone see a profit?

How many people outside the Trade realise that a big proportion of the picture palaces in England show no British pictures whatever? America, with her big home market, can afford to let us have her pictures cheaply, and our exhibitors here accordingly book them—often without even seeing them first. This means that our British firms have to put up with the crumbs where they should be getting a big share of the loaf.

The root of the matter lies in two problems, both of which could be remedied if the attention of the Trade was called to them. The first is the question of money.

A very large sum has been set aside by the Government to encourage British trade and relieve unemployment. Why should not some of this be used to develop our great British film industry?

It was given as the considered opinion of one of the greatest men in the kinema world to-day that, given a reasonable market and financial assistance, we could employ (almost at once) in the kinema Trade, three men for every one that is employed to-day. There is also the additional argument that much of the office, and even factory, work could be done by the slightly disabled men who are so difficult to place in ordinary work.

Secondly, to ensure our market—since it is useless to make goods unless we can market them—we could have all the opening we want if our Colonial and Imperial possessions were applied to and asked not to grant a licence to any kinema on British soil without the proviso that they must show a certain definite proportion of British films. This suggestion was first put forward by Mr. Hughes to cover Australia alone, but I believe in the wider application of the scheme will lie the salvation of the British film industry.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Soon after these words appear in print

Adrian Brunel will have left London for his Moroccan trip. He wrote me last week to say that he was ill in bed and I at first attributed his sudden breakdown to the five months' hard work he had put in on the Club committee! By the way, Mr. Brunel says that as he cannot find time to read all the valuable contents of the Kine Weekly he suggests that the experts who contribute regular articles on specified subjects to the Kine, should be invited to give lectures to the members of the Club. "This I know would be welcome," he adds, "to the members of the Club, whose lecture circle should in time develop into a University of Kinematography." I must pass the suggestion on, as it is such an excellent one.

I regret to learn that on account of a very serious attack of gastritis B. Doxatt Pratt is confined to his bed for some weeks and unable to continue the production of the next Granger-Binger film. But he wishes me to assure his friends that he hopes that before January is out he will be hard at work again on a new production.

Walter Forde has evidently decided to revolutionise British comedy producing; at least, that is what I imagined when I visited him at Stoll's last week. He had a set built on the spare floor at Cricklewood, the one on which Blackton worked, which covered nearly the whole floor space. For a film comedy it is without doubt the largest set ever erected in England. It would be regarded as rather a large set even for a drama. It represented a big store, and a very good representation it was too.

Sinclair Hill casts some interesting little sidelights on the big battle scene in his "Truants" between the French Foreign Legion and a crowd of Nomad Arabs. The hero, Tony Stretton (played by Philip Simmons) enlists in the Foreign Legion in order to prove to his wife Millie (Joan Morgan) that he can make good without her money or influence. Now, the Foreign Legion, of course, is composed of all sorts of men from all sorts of countries, and they have a very rough time, but enjoy the one privilege of being "asked no questions." No fewer than fourteen different nationalities were represented in the crowd that composed the Foreign Legion in the picture, and one of their number had actually fought with the Moors against the real Legion, and consequently was able to assist the director in getting the various details correct.

"Every language from German to Arabic was spoken by the Legionaries," declares Sinclair Hill, "and the language least understood was English. Both my assistants and I were directing half the time in French, while an ex-soldier shouted instructions to the enemy in Arabic! The babel was simply wonderful. One of the most remarkable features of the whole thing was the similarity of military precision exhibited by some of the Legionaries who had signed on as Swiss to the military precision of our late enemies, the Germans. But as in the case of the real Foreign Legion, no questions were asked!" If this means that some of these folk were Germans then I think several questions ought to have been asked.

British pictures and their makers have a very prominent position in the January issue of the Picturegoer, the high-class monthly fan magazine. W. A. Williamson, the editor, is the author of an exceptionally interesting write-up of the big fight scene in "Mord Em'ly" at the Welsh Pearson studios, while a double-page article deals with the attempts that various producing companies have made to film London. I would like to congratulate the Picturegoer on its enterprise in publishing in this issue the full story of "The Glorious Adventure," which publication synchronises with the public exhibition of the Blackton colour production. There are 64 pages in the Picturegoer, all in photogravure—truly a good bob's worth.

Things look bright for the profession next year. Among a few of the other signs that point to a record year for English film artistes is the fact that Robert Brunton has sold his studio, one of the biggest, if not the biggest, in America, and he is shortly arriving in England to erect an up-to-date studio here. Then there is a very big historical production now in course of preparation which should be started on in February. Gaumont will no doubt commence work on its big super, "Rob Roy," early in the year, and rumour has it that Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks will be working here next summer.

I had a talk with H. B. Parkinson between shots at the Master Films studios last week. He is immensely pleased with the success of his first series of song pictures, and is commencing work shortly on a further series. The new series will be more topical, being screen versions of this year's pantomime successes. At the moment the "Tense Moments with Great Authors" is occupying all the attention of the directorial staff at Teddington.

"MEGAPHONE."

And make up by electric light,
And then along come fog and rain
And so I take it off again.

With only my expenses paid;
Another day of mud, and mist,
Makes me a ruddy pessimist.

But now, although I'm in a job,
I never seem to earn a bob.

But while they wait to "snatch the sun,"
I only learn to dodge the dun.

And then along come slush and snow,
And home again I sadly go.

THE SECRET

by MAX FREEMAN.

One does not need to be the proud possessor of vast experience of men and things, or to rank among the experts in matters cinematographic, to realise that motion pictures are not, nor even can be, the work of the Director. Neither are they the work of the Cameraman. Whether Stars of outstanding ability or name, or whether only constituent parts of the shadowy milky way, no Artistes or group of Artistes can claim that a particular picture is their work.

To trace the picture as a finished article through the various stages from its inception will help to make my point clear. A good synopsis may be spoiled by an indifferent Scenarist. The most perfect scenario may easily be marred by faulty interpretation on the part of the Director, or by some failure of the Casting Director in regard to persons, or types, or costumes. The successive good work of Scenarist, and Director, may be reduced in value by the inferior efforts of the Cameraman.

Yet another step. The most delightful scenario faultlessly interpreted by the skill and knowledge of the best Director and Cameramen may be robbed of its with like, successfully with all comers. This being so, a conspiracy of talent, artistry, study, experience, business acumen, patience and determination (happily already indicated in the British National Film League) is certain shortly to compensate for the wasted war years, which lost so much to the British Industry.

It may be well here to refer to another matter of mutual importance to Directors and Artistes. The charge has been made—and apparently with some justification—that certain Directors refuse to allow any initiative, or private interpretation of character, on the part of Artistes, but insist on rigid adherence to direction. This is obviously a mistake, as it must tend to “cramp the style” of Artistes who have been at pains to assimilate the characters of the parts being played.

It must, however, be borne in mind that the opposite extreme—viz., licence in the matter of interpretation by Artistes—would be disastrous. Some Artistes, in their enthusiasm for the right of private interpretation, overlook the important fact that a general direction, or an interpretation by one mind, as story, wealth of incident, accuracy of detail, freedom from exaggeration, a minimum of sub-titles, consistent interpretation, good photography, low cost of production. By low cost of production I do not mean cheese-paring, or a false economy in any direction involving the sacrifice of essentials. The cost of production can be kept down to a proper minimum by wise foresight in regard to preparation and choice of interior and exterior scenes, and their sequential photography; by the choice of seasons and a more careful observation of prospective weather conditions; by the careful selection of Artistes who, through knowledge of the technique of their work and the requirements of correct portrayal and registration, reduce the number of rehearsals to a minimum; (every Director knows that over-rehearsing is fatal to good artistry). The main point is that attention to these things will make for lessening the period of production, and thus automatically decrease the total cost without reducing efficiency.

virtue by one or more of the participant Artistes.

At the risk of seeming to labour a truism, I must emphasise this point in the interests of British production, because it is only by the general realisation of the principle indicated that the British Industry can hope to secure and retain its rightful supremacy in the film markets of the world. I claim that as units, whether Synopsists, Scenarists, Directors, Cameramen, Electricians, or Artistes, we Britishers can compete, like against a variety of interpretations by several, is essential to continuity and consistency in the picture as a whole. The wise Director will allow the greatest possible liberty to his Artistes within the above limits if he would secure the best results.

As a last point I venture to suggest: that the steps to commercial value—which is, after all, the goal aimed at—must be religiously observed, and none of them skipped, if the goal is to be reached. These steps include: a good

"ADJECTIVES."

Alice looked round and saw a funny little man with a very yellow face indeed standing beside her.

"Don't take any notice of him," he said again.

"Isn't he important?" said Alice, doubtfully.

The little man laughed. "The difference between him and me," he said definitely, "is that he isn't half as important as he looks, and I don't look half so important as I am. And quite candidly," he gave a glance round to see that nobody was listening, and then came close to Alice's ear and whispered, "quite candidly, we're neither of us half so important as we think we are."

"But you are important, aren't you?" said Alice politely.

"Well, I'm only a 'small part,'" admitted the little man, "but I am frightfully important to me, of course—nobody is really quite so important to me as I am. Is my face all right?" he added.

"Oh, I think so," said Alice, and had to add—"for people who like it that colour." She was a truthful little girl.

"Yes, I think my face will do," said the little man, complacently. "I could take some off, or put some more on, of course."

"Oh, please don't!" said Alice. "I don't think I could bear it if you took any of your face off."

"Funny child!" said the little man. "Of course, yours is all wrong."

"My face?" said Alice, rather startled. The man nodded. "What's wrong with it?" she asked.

"Pink and white," said the man.

"Oh, I like it like that," said Alice, relieved.

"Of course, if you know more about it than I do, why talk!" said the man, a little huffily. "I say it's all wrong. Pink and white! It will all come out black—of course, if you don't mind . . ."

"Oh, but I do mind, and I hope it won't," interrupted poor Alice.

"Well, it's the Director's business," said the little man. "He'll give it to you!"

"He can't give it to me when I've got it," said Alice, feeling her face anxiously. The little man laughed again. "Please, who is the Director?" she went on.

"You'll find out soon enough," was the reply.

"Is he important?" said Alice, trying again.

"Thinks he is!" said the little man gloomily.

"Isn't there anybody who is really important without thinking they are?" enquired Alice.

"Very few," said the little man. "Hardly any—there's you, of course!"

"Me?" cried Alice, surprised out of her English Grammar.

"Well, you're Alice, aren't you?" said the little man. "Isaacson would hardly have got the Sole Rights in you, if you weren't a bit important."

"I wish he hadn't" said Alice, "I thought I belonged to me—I did this morning, anyhow!"

"Good heavens, no!" said the little man. "You belong to him body and soul. Body and soul!" he repeated, with grim amusement. "Of course, he'll say you belong to the 'G-r-r-eat British Public!' but that's only bluff. I don't suppose you'll recognise yourself though when he's done with you."

"I don't suppose I shall," thought poor Alice. "Not if I'm to be twisted on five reels and come out all black."

"The important thing," the little man went on, "is Adjectives, of course."

"Adjectives?" said Alice, surprised.

"Two or three good Adjectives after the Trade Show would make a world of difference," he said thoughtfully. "They want a bit of finding, though. You know 'The Author and the Manager,' of course?"

"I'm afraid not," said Alice.

"For a person of importance you don't seem to know much," said the little man, rather rudely, Alice thought. "Sit down, and I'll tell you."

Alice sat down, and he began reciting in a slow, measured voice:—

THE AUTHOR AND THE MANAGER.

The Author and the Manager
Were walking up the Strand,
They wept like anything to see
New Films on every hand:
"If ours were half as good," they cried,
"By jove! it would be grand."

They went down to the Trade Show,
But the Trade said: "Please explain
"Why all the little 'Iris-outs'
"Flick in and out again.
"And all the Mixes never mix,
"And all the rest was pain!"

"If seven men with seven pens
"Boomed it for half a year,
"Do you suppose," the Author said,
"We'd show a profit clear?"
"I doubt it," said the Manager,
And shed a bitter tear.

"But all we want is adjectives,"
The Author cried with hope;
"O, Adjes come and walk with us!"
The Adjectives said "Nope"
"I guess we're working overtime
"Upon the Bioscope."

They went down to the Bioscope,
And thundered on the door,
And "Give us Adjectives!" they cried,
"Some new ones—say, a score!"
The Editor came out and said:
"We haven't any more!"

They cried aloud for Adjectives,
They cried aloud in vain;
And Adverbs scuttled from their holes,
And pattered round like rain.
"We don't want you!" the Author said.
They scuttled back again.

And Substantives and Verbs came out,
And scrambled round their knees;
While Interjections panted up
With "Won't you use us, please?"
The Manager said nothing, but "I wish I'd eaten cheese."

They shrieked in vain for Adjectives
From Dawn to set of Sun;
They said they wanted Adjectives,
But answer came there none—
And that was scarcely odd, because They'd murdered every one.

"I think that's very pretty," said Alice.

"It is, if you understand it," said the little man.

"I don't understand quite all of it," she admitted.

"I'm here to explain," said the little man patiently.

"Why did the Adjectives say 'Nope'?" asked Alice.

"American!" said the little man. "All Film Adjectives are American; you know that surely!"

"And who murdered them exactly?" asked Alice.

"The Editor of the Bioscope, of course," said the little man. "All the other Editors held them down for him. Anything else?"

"Only I can't quite see why the Manager said, 'I wish I'd eaten cheese,'" said Alice diffidently.

"That's the simplest of the lot," said the little man triumphantly. "It was because he thought they 'grew 'ere.'" He looked at his watch. "Ten past twelve!" he shouted. "Good God! They've been open ten minutes!" and he disappeared at a run, leaving Alice even more bewildered than ever.

Kenneth Easton, the scenarist, tells the following story, which happened during the filming of a series of comedies. "The director was endeavouring to make the comedian jump off a high building on to the studio lot in a special way. The director showed the comedian just how it was done about six or seven times, and even then the comedian was unable to do it right. The director scratched his head, and said: 'Verily, the director's lot is hard.' Comedian smiled, and said: 'But the studio lot is harder'"

As is well-known, one of the most striking features of the big London Studio of Famous Players-Lasky British Producers, is the new air washing plant which was recently installed by Major Chas. H. Bell, O.B.E., the studio general manager, and which will not only keep the building free from fog during the winter months, but also insures a constant circulation of pure fresh air in the studio all the year round.

A few weeks ago, as there was a suspicion of fog in the atmosphere, Major Bell, remembering that George Fitzmaurice was doing a big crowd interior that day, arrived to the studio at eight o'clock in order to get the plant in full working order, and have the atmosphere of crystalline clearness by the time Mr. Fitzmaurice started on production.

Now it happened that that day "Fitz." was directing a scene in "Three Live Ghosts," showing the Armistice celebrations in a big Whitechapel pub. The air-washing plant was still in full swing and justifying the firm's highest expectations in every possible way, when the following S.O.S. call came from Stage No. 2:—

"Mr. Fitzmaurice's compliments, and could Major Bell do something to stop that machine. Forty 'extras' are smoking their hardest to get the proper bar room atmosphere, and the air-washing fiend is clearing away the smoke as fast as it is produced."

SUBTLETIES AND SLEDGEHAMMERS

A motto for most studio dressing rooms:—"Many are cold but few are frozen."

This season of the year has provoked a correspondent to write and ask us when is the best time to kiss a girl. Looking back over the conquests of the past, we are forced to reply that when a girl is not in the humour for being kissed she needs a doctor.

Tony Fraser replies to Max Roma thusly:—

"There was a poor rhymers (God save us) named Max, Whose grip on himself was unconsciously lax.
Once on a time
He burst into rhyme—
Since the effort's his best, we gladly call pax."

And Harry Worth replies to Tony Fraser:—

"Tony Fraser may be good making rhyme,
But I feel he is mistaken this time;
When he called me old
He left me stone cold—
I'm not old, but just in my prime."

Not content with digging at Max and Harry, the irrepressible Limerickian, Tony Fraser, aims his shaft at Walter Forde:—

"There once was an actor named Forde Whose valuable life he's insured;
This must be the way
To get on to-day,
For now 'mong the stars he has soared."

Flora Le Breton says that there is every prospect of hobble skirts coming into fashion again, and the men are quite in favour of them. But we are sure that certain other men will be up against them.

Some one has referred to a certain gentleman well known in the film world as "The Prince of Lionists." We hail "Is-rael Highness."

Rex Davis says that abstinence is both healthy and Scriptual, but in the Scriptures is an isolated account of a man who asked for water, and he was in Hell.

ON WRITING SCENARIOS

II.—CHOICE OF THE THEME

by GERTRUDE M. ALLEN

When you have decided that you are endowed with the necessary qualifications for the making of a scenario writer—that you have a creative imagination, a good power of visualisation, and an inexhaustible fund of patience—then your first serious consideration, when you set to work, is the choice of a theme.

An unwritten law has been established in the kinema, just as it has upon the stage, and those who study the hundreds of different brands of films which come from the various studios will find that the same type of film comes from an individual studio each time, and that most producers, and most players, have developed a "style" and placed the catchet of individuality on their work. So that, for instance, one would never associate Lilian Gish with an elegant, sophisticated "Society woman" type of part—she is always the fresh, unsophisticated, charming personification of youth—tragic sometimes, but always youthful and sweet. And, again, Charles Ray or Douglas McLean, although "stars" in their own right, never interpret the accepted type of "leading man" part, but have both created, and remained faithful to, a personal characterisation which has made them famous.

This fundamental law of film-land must, therefore, be remembered by the would-be screen author when he conceives his first "subject."

In another chapter of this series I shall deal with the question of writing for an individual player—a delicate and complicated task which the novice would be well advised to shun. But always when writing for the screen, the author must study and pander to the screen's own individual idioms. We know, for we have been told frequently enough, that "there is nothing new under the sun," but there are a million new ways of telling old stories, and the screen is a vehicle through which stories may be told as they have never been told before.

A score of screen stories have been worked to what should have been death, but they still go struggling on, existing where their stronger brethren fail to find life; nauseating and irritating the public with their feeble attempts to entertain.

How well we know, how well we have learnt to hate the "eternal triangle"! If only some original soul could make it a quadrangle! And the angelic screen baby! If only it would assume some vestige of human weakness; a world-wide audience went crazy with joy over Jackie Coogan—he was so delightfully naughty, so refreshing a change to the sweet screen-child we have so often met!

The obscure weavers of romance would soon emerge from obscurity, the gratitude of a tired world would soon be theirs if they could tell the old, old stories in a new way.

So my advice to the newcomer is "be original, if you know how—if not, be just different."

And with the whole world for a "setting," what joyous tales of Life, Love, Adventure, and Romance you could tell! For in this respect, at least, you have an advantage over the stage dramatist. Your romance could start its career in England, develop it in France, go over to China for a change of air, and breathe its last in an African desert. If the strength of a story justifies the expense, a producer will take his company anywhere to interpret it. And a film studio is very obliging. In its confines can be reproduced startling replicas of practically any of the world's four corners.

But you are not essentially being "different" by creating an extravaganza. That is only permissible when you choose a theme that demands it. Some of the greatest and most successful films ever screened have told stories of the simple life—stories laid in the simple environs of everyday existence.

Choose your theme, therefore, with an eye to its story-telling value, and once having chosen it, saturate your brain in its atmosphere, think it out thoroughly—all its possibilities, all its impossibilities. Eradicate the latter, and make every possible use of the former.

And, if you choose a story which is essentially English in atmosphere, take care to keep your characters "essentially English," and if, in the evolution of the story, you find it necessary to introduce an alien character of any description, then make that character thoroughly alien, and thus enhance the true atmosphere.

"A story with a moral" is generally recognised as the best sort of a story to tell, but it is not inevitably so. If you can weave a romance or a tale of adventure which lacks a moral yet still remains clean and wholesome, you are entitled to do so on its merits, because an audience pays to be entertained, not to be converted. Only a genius can sub-consciously convert an audience, and a genius is a curio in any profession!

So choose where you will, and how you like, so long as you can "entertain," and in the world's great store-house of reality you can find more stories than you will ever live to tell!

SCREEN VALUES

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"A Lowland Cinderella:"

Progress. Starring Joan Morgan. Directed by Sidney Morgan.

THIS is an instance where a skilful direction rises triumphant over unsuitability of story. There is a certain charm in Crockett's original novel, but it is the charm of the written word as opposed to pictorial values. And it has been up to the director to overcome the pictorial poverty of the story and to submit a photoplay of interest. In this he has been successful.

* * *

In addition to careful direction, the picture has the advantage of a well-chosen cast.

Joan Morgan improves with each production in which she plays, and in this one she is charmingly sympathetic, and evidences an intelligent grip over the temperamental peculiarities of the character she portrays.

We are pleased to renew acquaintance with Kate Phillips. In this picture she plays grandmother, and although the part is somewhat small she invests it with a high quality of artistry that causes it to be of utmost value to the production.

Ralph Forbes is rather weak as the Master of Darrock; he is altogether too wooden.

Charles Levey has been provided with a part that suits him ideally: as the bad uncle he reveals unquestioned ability and histrionic powers.

The cameraman has done his work well, without performing any photographic miracles.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Very good.

LEAD: Perfect.

SUPPORTS: Generally good.

LITERARY: Story unsuitable; scenario good; continuity fairly good.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Good.

EXTERIORS: Well chosen and picturesque.

INTERIORS: Adequate.

"No. 5, John Street."

Thompson. Starring Zena Dare. Directed by Kenelm Foss. Scenario by Kenelm Foss.

BBETTER motion pictures than this have come from the Walthamstow studios. The faults fall under two heads: Story and direction (the poor characterisation is due more to lack of direction than to inability on the part of the players).

This does not mean that the production has not its good points; it means that it is like the curate's egg.

As a book, "No. 5, John Street" is still somewhat interesting, despite the fact that its ideas are considerably moth-eaten. But, divested of its verbal clothing and transferred to the limited space of the screen, the story can only be saved from ridicule by high-quality acting. And this is missing.

In the cast are good players, with intelligence and experience, and yet their individual and concerted performances fail to envelop the carcass of a story with the warmth and genuine movement of real life. This, we repeat, is so obviously not so much the fault of the players as of the director, who has failed to handle his human material and failed to extract from them the blood-warm characterisation that is so necessary to making "No. 5" into a worth-while photoplay.

* * *

This is Zena Dare's screen debut, and with more screen experience and in a more appropriate part she should become one of our leading film actresses. As a Cockney flower-girl she is a disappointment; she never succeeds in clothing her personality with that of the part.

The only other member of the cast worthy of special mention is Randle Ayrton, who came from America to play the Anarchist. There never was such an Anarchist outside the columns of the Morning Post or the imagination of the Duke of Northumberland.

* * *

Kenelm Foss, in our opinion, is a far better scenarist than director. His adaptation of an unlikely story is good.

There is a high photographic value attached to the production, thanks to the skill of the cameraman, whose work is of the highest merit.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Defective

LEAD: Unconvincing.

SUPPORTS: Fair.

LITERARY: Story unsuitable; adaptation clever.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Excellent.

LIGHTING: Good.

EXTERIORS: Very good.

INTERIORS: Well staged.

"Sheer Bluff."

Granger-Binger. Starring Maudie Dunham, Percy Standing and Henry Victor.

Directed by Frank Richardson. Scenario by Benedict James. Photography by Seko Boersma.

THE advantage of having a production well cast is clearly demonstrated here. The story is not exactly original, and is hardly strong enough, but with carefully-chosen characters and good production, Frank Richardson has made a highly entertaining film, which is a sure winner.

The film contains many outstanding points. The care that has been given to detail has not been wasted. There is a real human note about the production, and Mr. Richardson has succeeded in handling the whole very well.

* * *

Percy Standing gives an impressive and convincing performance. He is a fine type and a clever actor, and is well suited for the rôle he plays in the film, namely, that of a very businesslike business man.

Henry Victor gives another fine characterisation; he plays his part in a manner that cannot fail to please even the most severe critics.

Maudie Dunham has not been given a part which lends itself to anything really great, but she has certainly made the most out of it. She makes a beautiful and lifelike heroine.

All the smaller characters give excellent performances.

* * *

The story is not an original one by any means, and is rather thin; the scenario has been well written, however, and the continuity is good throughout.

Zeko Boersma has obtained some fine shots. His photography is exceptionally good throughout; the lighting, both interior and exterior, is of a high standard.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: First rate.

LEADS: Well cast and well acted.

SUPPORTS: Very good.

LITERARY: Story not a novelty; scenario and continuity good.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Excellent.

LIGHTING: Good.

INTERIORS: Efficient.

EXTERIORS: Adequate.

LOW-TONED PHOTOGRAPHS

by COLIN N. BENNETT, F.R.C.S., F.R.P.S.

Technical Expert to "The Kinematograph Weekly."

In photography of all kinds under-exposure is the unforgivable sin, yet like most other sins it is, up to a point, capable of being covered up. You can't make a badly exposed negative print rightly, and once you get beyond a certain limit of the film emulsion's latitude the negative will not give a passable print at all. Still, we are entering upon a time of year when under-exposure faces the topical worker often, and the location man sometimes, so we shall be none the worse for sizing the situation up beforehand, and trying to realise what are our limits and how much we may do within those limits.

The Irreducible Minimum.

The first thing we must be sure about is to be able to estimate as closely as possible the smallest amount of natural light with which we can work. To help us in this an actinometer or exposure meter is most valuable. With either a Watkins or Wynne meter we shall find that the absolute low limit of illumination is reached when the test paper takes two minutes to darken fully. In making the test it is, naturally, of high importance to see that the light which strikes upon the actinometer shall be no stronger than is coming to the more important objects in the picture to be filmed.

Film Stock.

It goes without saying that, where we have a doubt about the sufficiency of the light, we shall open the cover shutter blades as fully as they will go and fit our most rapid lens. When we come to choosing the best film for the work, most of us will be brought up short in the realisation we have no effective choice at all. Those others who may be more fortunate may bear in mind a few pointers. For one thing, actinic (blue and violet) rays are the first to be stolen from daylight by heavy cloud, fog and mist.

Relative Rapidities.

As an illustration of the truth of this, in winter, on dull days, the relative quickness of portrait photographers' printing-out paper and carbon paper becomes greatly altered. Normally, a carbon print is ready when a P.O.P. print started at the same time, in the same natural light, under a negative of similar density, has reached about two-thirds its proper depth. On very dull days this ratio of printing times can no longer be counted upon by a carbon printer, for the bichromatised tissue, being sensitive to green and blue-green light, prints on relatively quicker, while the P.O.P. lags behind. It stands to reason, therefore, that for motion-picture work in a bad light the more colour sensitive our negative film is, the better can we combat a tendency to under-exposure.

For the Harassed Topical Man.

Panchromatic film is the thing to use on valuable topicals where the light is almost hopeless and where the dark-room staff can be trusted to do the developing in total darkness, or else by the technique of desensitising with phenosafranin.

One more point may be set forth while on the subject of filmstock: a dry film will work a trifle faster, and will record better shadow detail, than the film which has become damp and flabby through storage. If a roll of unexposed negative film be very carefully wound on a drying room drum in total darkness and given ten minutes turning in warm dry air, afterwards being re-rolled slowly, and frictionlessly, and loaded in the camera feed box, it will, harring static electric markings, make a better showing in a poor light than will its sister roll which has not been given a similar dry-out. But the proviso about static markings is important, for whatever of bad effect a little residual dampness in the filmstock's gelatine may have, it is a splendid thing for warding off spontaneous electrification of the base.

The Value of the Thermometer.

Contrary to what might be supposed, there is one way in which we really can make an exposed negative yield more shadow detail than it would normally be able to do. This is by developing it in a warm bath. The absolute high limit of warmth, unless the film has previously been hardened, or unless a special hardener is incorporated in the developer, is eighty degrees. If this is exceeded by even one or two degrees the gelatine will ruck or dissolve, and the negative will, of course, be ruined. Generally speaking, the highest bath temperature it is advisable to work at is seventy-five degrees. At from seventy-five to eighty degrees the extra shadow detail obtainable, as compared with what we should get on a clipping from the same film developed at sixty-five degrees, is very remarkable.

A Warning.

Along with this extra detail we may expect chemical fog, and when it becomes visible, and well before it gets heavy, the film must be quickly rinsed in cold water and plunged in the fixing tank. Once let chemical fog catch up on the faint half-emerged shadow detail, the general quality of the negative will be far worse than if it had simply been developed at normal temperature and not given any special treatment at all.

Coming to ways of palliating under-exposure effect during development, there are two. We may use a developing agent which is highly energetic and possesses a high Watkins time factor, and we can encourage the appearance of shadow detail before the high-lights choke up by using the developer comparatively weak and lengthening development accordingly.

Some Developers.

Metol is a suitable developer for under-exposed negatives. A plain metol developing bath can be made up by simply leaving out the hydroquinone, and nearly all the bromide, from our usual metol-hydro developer. If the regular bath contains citrate, leave out the whole of that also.

Other developing agents, not generally found in the store-rooms of kinematograph film producers, but which are, each in its way, wonderfully suitable for under-exposed films, are amidol and glycin. Amidol, unlike other silver bromide reducing agents, works without an alkaline accelerator, being simply dissolved as required in a solution of soda sulphite.

The working bath needs no bromide at all, and if used at a temperature not exceeding seventy Fahrenheit will produce little chemical fog, even though allowed to act on the emulsion for a long period, during which time it will bring out whatever half-tones are recoverable.

Glycin is a developer of quite a different sort. Since 1914, and up to quite recently, it has been off the British market. Now it can be bought again in brands, British made and otherwise. It works slowly, surely and cleanly in a bath containing soda sulphite and potassium carbonate, without bromide. The bath should be used diluted, and may be well warmed, as already described for under-exposure work in general. Development takes a long time, an hour or more perhaps, but when the negative film emerges the last possible scrap of shadow detail is there.

Making a Prosperous New Year.

FIRST of all we hasten to wish all our readers a most prosperous year. Having done that with all sincerity, we add that from the evidence within our possession and the facts within our knowledge there is every reason for predicting that 1922 will indeed be the best year in the history of the British producing industry. It is only natural and right for our readers to assume that, by virtue of the elaborate organisation of our associate journal, the Kinematograph Weekly, we must of necessity be in an exceptionally well informed position, and it is because of the truth of this assumption that we are so confident in assuring all engaged in the production of British motion pictures that the year whose advent we shall hail at midnight to-night will be a period of exceptional prosperity and success.

Inter-Dependence.

THERE are reasons — and very good ones — for making this assertion and they strike very deep into the roots of the whole kinema industry. And it is opportune to emphasise a fact that is more readily overlooked than regarded; the inter-dependence of the various phases of the industry. It is one of the boasts of the artistic side that it is self-contained and has no direct connection with the renting or the exhibitorial sections of the industry. But this is as foolish as it is erroneous. In no other industry are the various units so fundamentally dependent upon each other. No sane person imagines—seriously and intelligently imagines—that there would be any film producing industry if there were no exhibitors. Nor that there would be any exhibitors if there was no public demand for films. If there is any section that could be eliminated as being possibly superfluous then it must be the renting side.

The Hope for 1922.

BUT the main fact that requires emphasis is that the producing, the renting and the exhibitorial sides of the business are inter-dependent on each other and all totally dependent upon the public. And here it is that the hope for 1922 is centred; a hope that is very robust and well founded. For there is no diminution in the public demand for motion picture entertainment. With this proviso: the standard of quality must be elevated. That is to say that the public will absolutely and eagerly "eat up" films if they are of a high quality. So that the circle turns to the producing industry again; if British producing concerns will turn out films of high entertainment value the public will respond by placing British films on a pedestal of "the kinema profession really has become a great serious profession." His dramatic outburst is true to life: "few of us really took the profession seriously and we who did thought that we were on a bad egg; that the profession would crumble to pieces and leave us stranded." That this feeling does exist in certain cases we know to be a fact. But such persons ought to leave a profession that appears to them to be so precarious. If they have not confidence in their calling, their best plan is to get another "call." Faint hearts are not only unsuccessful in winning fair ladies but also in achieving success in any walk of life—including the kinema profession. It is to be sincerely hoped that the new year will see a weeding out of the Doleful Dicks and the Bilious Berthas and the Mournful Mary's and the Jeune Jeremiahs; we shall be content to have the profession made up of the Strong-Hearts and the Strong-Hands—the men and the women with courage and confidence who are prepared to work hard so that Gerald McKie's vision materialises and the kinema profession becomes "a huge national enterprise, bringing success and prosperity to all engaged in it."

Kinema Club Notices

INSTEAD of an informal House-Warming it is intended to have an Official Opening Ceremony on January 19, when the premises will be formally opened and the event celebrated at a Dinner to be followed by a Musical Program. Fuller particulars will be announced later.

ONLY a few days remain for applications as Foundation Members at the special annual subscription of Three Guineas. Members enrolled after January 5 will have to pay an annual subscription of Five Guineas.

¶ All enrolled members must send their subscriptions at once to the Hon. Secretary, Kinema Club, 93, Long Acre, W.C.2.

popularity that will for ever place American pictures on a lower plane. The prosperity of 1922 for the British producing industry rests, not on the lap of the gods, but in the hands of the British producing industry. And it is because we are aware of the determination of certain of the leading British concerns to increase quality as well as quantity of output that we look forward to 1922 with high hopes.

Invertebrate Professionals.

ELSEWHERE in this issue will be found an imaginative article "Nineteen-Thirty-Two," which will strike the superficial-thinker as being quite funny but which will appeal to the imaginative and the person with vision as containing germs of several good ideas. What is worthy of comment on this page is the realisation by Gerald McKie that bringing success and prosperity to all engaged in it."

Quit the Ruts!

ONE of the complaints that could be levelled against motion pictures with some degree of justification is that film plots are much of a muchness. Seldom, if ever, do we get farces and burlesques. We believe that a man with the right temperament could make a real old-fashioned rollicking farce that would be the talk of the industry for its laughter-provoking qualities. The man with the right mentality could make a film burlesque. A pet idea that we have always had is that there is a small fortune awaiting the man who can produce a film burlesque of some of the Sherlock Holmes stories. What film-producing concerns have to do is to get out of the rut.

We stand between two worlds : 1921 dead, and 1922 struggling to be born.

A great deal of slobber and sticky sentiment has gathered around the issue of new wall-calendars in the past : pensive maidens dream of the missed proposals of the past, and beery boys "swear off" for the future. It is with no intention to outshine the pensive maidens or the alcoholic youths that we draw attention to the fact that 1921, having handed in his checks, is about to be replaced by a sturdy youngster who has a whole year's life before him.

One of the traditions associated with this season is that a hefty kick should always be given the dying year; its obsequies are a chorus of dismal jeremiads and its epitaph : "Thank God, the year is dead."

But in taking a view of 1921 from the professional point of view we are forced to abstain from traditional procedure. Looking back over the months of the past, we find that 1921 has been a year of considerable importance to the British producing Industry.

'Tis true that it includes in its scope a cinema slump without parallel, but that slump was the result of a conspiracy of events such as unusual hot weather, a disastrous coal lockout and other blessings of this description. But these are causes which affect the picture house rather than the studio.

As a matter of fact, the wonderful weather of 1921 provided unusually fine opportunities for location work, and it is exceedingly disappointing to find that full advantage was not taken of these opportunities.

The slump in the picture theatres will be felt more by American film renters than by British producing concerns.

The most important happening of the year was the formation of the British National Film League with Colonel A. C. Bromhead at its head. The effect of this very valuable league is to ensure a regular supply of British films for British screens and a violent attack on the block-booking system which has done more than anything else to throttle the British producing Industry.

1921 has been the year of the birth of this journal—a fact that is not so much important for what it actually is as for what it signifies. The existence of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO is significant of the status that the British film producing Industry has attained. No longer can the Stage look on the Studio with contempt; no longer can Los Angeles look on the British Industry with amusement; an industry that is articulate is an industry powerful and conscious of its power. In 1922 and the years to follow, as in 1921, the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO stands for all that is highest and best in British productions : there is no aspect of the Industry in need of support or of condemnation that the STUDIO will not hasten to support or condemn.

During the year (and in that part of it in which the STUDIO has existed) the Kinema Club has been formed. This is not only a great triumph for the STUDIO but is of far-reaching importance to the whole of the cinema Industry. It requires the seer's vision to predict the beneficial influences that will result from such an organisation as the Club. In respect of the Club alone, the British producing Industry at once attains a crowning distinction, as in no country in the world is there such an institution.

Nor must the fact be overlooked that during 1921 British films of a new order have been achieved. In the space of a year films of the super-quality and magnitude as "The Bigamists," "The Glorious Adventure," "The Fruitful Vine," "Pickwick Papers," "Bluff," "The Night Hawk," and "Carnival" have been negotiated with utmost credit to all concerned. These are vindications of the claim that the STUDIO and its associated journal has made : that this country is capable of producing films better than the best Americans.

One other point that warrants notice : the gradual and almost imperceptible invasion of this country by the Americans. Directors, artistes, cameramen and whole producing units are slowly making their way to this country—all very ominous signs of the decay of Los Angeles and the recognition of this country by America as the centre of the producing world.

The foregoing are all facts of the past, and are only useful in so far as they are capable of bearing deductions for the future. And the greatest deduction of all (because it includes all others) is that now is the time for every member of the British film producing Industry to co-operate for the purpose of extracting every ounce of benefit from the propitious circumstances. The immediate may be a little gloomy, but our reading of the past and our knowledge of the potentialities of the future encourage us in the belief that 1922 is going to be the best, biggest and brightest year in the history of British films. With a readiness to pull together, all our readers can share in the advantages.

QUEEN MARY

It is perhaps characteristic of the man that while two or three other folk have been for years talking of filming Mary Queen of Scots, Denison Clift has swiftly made his decision and started on the preliminaries of making a picture around this tragic figure of history.

There are two aspects of the Royal tragedy—the historic and the romantic—and Mr. Clift, while paying great regard to the historic accuracy and authenticity of the actual incidents, is concentrating on the tragic romance of the story.

For many months, now, he has been engaged in careful and exhaustive research into all the historic facts connected with the story and has searched through all the official records at the British Museum in order to provide an historically accurate basis for his story.

He has now completed his scenario, emphasising the romantic side and minimising the religious aspect of the story, and this will be produced by him as an eight-reel drama. It is to be a tragio-romance, and Mr. Clift has made all the necessary arrangements for securing most of the scenes on the actual locations, including battle scene in Warwick Castle, and other scenes in other parts of Scotland.

Two or three of the leading historical experts have read and examined the scenario and have testified to the skill of Mr. Clift in developing the romantic side of the story without transgressing historical accuracy, and the care with which he has assiduously avoided any of the questions of religious controversy.

The scenario thus being completed and approved by historians, Mr. Clift is proceeding to cast for the picture. He has already secured, for the part of the Queen, Fay Compton, who is fortunate enough to possess a physiognomic resemblance to the tragic Queen that is truly remarkable. Miss Compton "made up" from the famous picture of Mary Queen of Scots which is in the Wallace Collection, and this reveals the fact that the actress's forehead and nose are phenomenally like the original.

Denison Clift expects to start actual producing in the course of the next few days and to complete the production early in 1922, when he is arranging a Trade show at which notable society and titled people have already promised to be present. "Mary Queen of Scots" is the first of a series of famous stories which Mr. Clift is to produce under the banner of "Denison Clift Art Productions," and we expect to be able to announce next week the name of the leading renting concern who is to handle them in this country, together with the name of a famous American firm that will handle them in U.S.A., and the name of the second Denison Clift production.

Mr. Clift has now finished his contract with Ideal, for whom he has produced several productions that are recognised as Britain's best. Prior to coming to this country he was engaged on the production side in America. In 1917 Cecil B. de Mille "discovered" Clift, and for two years he was attached to the literary staffs of De Mille and Thomas H. Ince, for whom he wrote stories featuring W. S. Hart, Sessue Haya-kawa, Louise Glaum and H. B. Walthall. In 1919 William Fox made Clift production editor to the Fox organisation. He then wrote the stories of, and produced, several films himself, in America prior to coming to this country, where he has been chief producer for Ideal, and numbers "The Diamond Necklace," "Demos," "Sonia," and "The Old Wives' Tale" to his credit.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Last Wednesday I shook hands with Adrian Brunel as he stepped into the taxi with Crispin Hay, his cameraman, to commence the journey to Morocco where he is to direct the Travel films and the Story-Travel films for Solar Productions. In the latter Annette Benson and Miles Mander will play leads, while the Travel films will be made in entirely original circumstances by virtue of the fact that each one will be based on the authority and advice of an expert on the particular locality. Thus Sir Percy Sykes and Sir Henry Bax-Ironside, K.C.M.G. (who are authorities on Morocco and the Balkans respectively) are on the board of directors and will advise on the productions. John Neill, the well-known civil engineer, is another director.

These Travel films will be five-reelers, and when completed will be shown at the Philharmonic Hall, while the particular authority will lecture on the locality. Solar Productions is to be congratulated, also, on having secured the services of Miles Mander as general manager. Mr. Mander, in addition to his recognised histrionic abilities, is very widely travelled and an authority on various European countries.

N. G. Harper makes a desperate bid for notoriety by writing a letter to the notorious Plain English in which he says: "By accident I have been for several years compelled to have close dealings with members of various film companies; and I have not yet discovered one company that is free from the Jewish influence and that is not a centre for the worst kinds of vice. One in particular, boasting an exaggeratedly 'British' name, and loudly advertising itself as 'all-British,' is run exclusively by German-Jews, and the studio is a perfect sink of corruption. These are the people who are to supply the entertainment of the British public."

Whoever N. G. Harper is I am fairly safe in defying him to name the British studio which is "a perfect sink of corruption." In their moments of healthy discontent artistes will call studios all sorts of names, but no one who knows British studio-land seriously suggests that immoral practices are indulged in. However,

I have written to the editor of Plain English and requested him to obtain from his correspondent full names, addresses and dates and the cases within his own experience

Already preparations are being made by Kenelm Foss for the production of his next film, "A Romance of Old Bagdad," in which Matheson Lang will play the leading part. The whole of the interior of the Walthamstow Studio will be transformed into an Eastern palace. This entails a considerable amount of work, and Mr. Foss estimates that the principal set will cost more to erect and furnish than any set yet utilised in a British studio. Mr. Foss has engaged an assistant whose expert knowledge in Eastern architecture, dress and customs will ensure the correctness of every detail. Apart from this, Victor McLaglan, who will also feature prominently in the cast, spent several years during the war as Provost-Marshal of Bagdad, and as he made a study of the customs and religious rites of the people, his knowledge will also prove of considerable value. Evelyn Brent and Dacia (the famous dancer from "Chu Chin Chow") have also been engaged for the film, work on which will commence at the earliest possible moment.

It is with profound regret that the whole of the kinema and theatrical professions heard of the death of Sir John Hare at his residence in Queen's Gate in his 77th year. The late Sir John became famous as a result of his appearances in "A Pair of Spectacles," and built up a great reputation for old man parts. He also played in films, in which he met with some degree of success. Incidentally, Douglas Munro tells me that during the air raids in 1917 he had to go on for Sir John in his part of Benjamin Goldfinch in "A Pair of Spectacles." The funeral of the remains of the late Sir John takes place to-day (Saturday).

George Woods-Taylor, the late secretary of the Kine-Cameramen's Society, and who is now in India as official cinematographer to the Prince of Wales' tour, writes to tell me that he expects to be back in England about April or May next. He sends the compliments of the season to all his friends through the STUDIO and, next to his Society, his chief concern is the Kinema Club. Mr. Woods-Taylor was on the original formation committee and worked hard for the success of the club.

Walter West is now nearing the completion of his latest picture. This is a Violet Hopson Production with the title "Scarlet Lady," Miss Hopson playing lead. I was interested to know that the old steeplechaser, Platonic, now running over the English courses, is one of the "stars" in this film and that while working in it the horse also ran in a race at Windsor last week—and won. A good omen for Walter West's picture. "MEGAPHONE."

"NINETEEN-THIRTY-TWO"

Crash!

Twenty worlds seemed to collide inside his head, and Gerald McKie awoke.

Everything seemed strange, and yet familiar. The room was new, but old. He himself seemed stale, and yet fresh.

Bewildered, he staggered—his legs were unaccountably weak beneath him—out of the door. He found himself in an office, sumptuously furnished, brilliantly lighted, delightfully cosy.

Behind a massive desk sat an elderly-looking man; piercing eyes, silky-white hair, moustache and beard, smart suit, well-manicured hands.

The man at the desk gasped when he saw Gerald.

"Heavens! it's McKie!" and he jumped to his feet, seized Gerald's two hands, and led him to a chair.

"Where am I? What am I? Who am I?" the interrogations gushed out.

"My dear fellow, there is much to explain, and I'll do it after we have had dinner together. But the outline of the position is this: Ten years ago you were a film artiste, and one night there was a little accident at the studio, the result of which was the depression of a bone in your head on to your brain. And for ten years you have been in a state of coma. To-day you have recovered!" * * *

After dinner Gerald heard all, and the story was a combination of "Rip Van Winkle" and Wells' "When the Sleeper Wakes." He now knew that it was New Year's Day, 1932, and that the world down in Flicker Alley had progressed ten years.

Next day he started out to Studioland in company with the elderly gentleman, who he discovered was W. G. Talkner, who in Gerald's "day" was a leading film journalist.

"This," said W. G., indicating a palatial building in Wardour Street, "is the office of 'La Agencie Artiste.' Here all the casting of all the producing companies is done. This extensive business commenced in a little office off Long Acre, where an agency was run by three energetic young men named Bertram Fryer, W. K. Rodger and Max Roma. . . . Let us go inside."

They passed through the revolving doors and were approached by a uniformed attendant.

"Are you new clients?" he asked, and on receiving an affirmative reply, they were ushered into a lift, which took them to the third floor.

They passed into a room marked "Registrations."

With unobtrusive courtesy they were received by one of the three clerks in attendance.

"What is your type?" was the first question.

"Juvenile lead," replied Gerald.

The clerk swung into position a large filing cabinet and pulled open the section marked "Juvenile Leads."

Professional name, private name and address, height (measured on the spot by the clerk), colour of hair and eyes, accomplishments and particulars of previous work were all noted down, and Gerald was then passed into the "Test Room," where a hundred feet of film was taken of him and filed for reference.

As they went out into the street W. G. explained that the old system of a multiplication of agencies had been done away with by the enterprise of the "three young fellows of Broad Court," and the numerous agents had amalgamated into "La Agencie Artiste." Only at La Agencie could artistes be engaged, and only members of the Kinema Club were allowed to be registered at La Agencie.

"What about casting directors?" asked Gerald.

"Most of them are on the staff of La Agencie," explained W. G.

"And now what'll happen to me?"

"When a director is casting for a production he goes to La Agencie and hands over his script to the chief casting director there. Together they discuss the players required, and then the casting staff is put on the job. Each member of the casting staff is a specialist; one deals with leading ladies, another with juvenile leads, another with ingénues, another with heavies, another with supers, and so on. They select from their dossiers half a dozen of each character required, and these are considered by the director, who also spends half an hour in the operating room, where the test films of the players are run off for him to see. When he has made his selection the players are called to La Agencie. They are each supplied with a copy of the full script and a sheet of 'make-up' requirements—wigs, costumes, etc. They are allowed to take the script home to study carefully, and the 'make-up' sheet they take, first to the wig maker, and then to the costumier, each of whom, by the way, has an office on the Kinema Club premises, because, you must understand, the club is the centre and the circumference of the producing industry. . . . Let us go along there now."

Before Gerald had met with his accident he had been present at the first general meeting of members of the club, and his recollection of the club was two buildings in Great Newport Street. And it was to Great Newport Street that W. G. piloted him now. But the two buildings had grown into almost the whole side of the street, commencing with the premises that he remembered used to be Goldwyn's headquarters and ending next door to a large hotel which stood at the corner of Upper St. Martin's Lane.

The entrance of the club was still at No. 9, but the entrance alone occupied the whole of the frontage of that building. There was a roomy foyer inside the revolving doors. Here were men talking and smoking; messengers in livery hurrying to and fro; two lifts were constantly ascending and descending.

W. G. passed Gerald through as a "visitor."

Disregarding the lifts, they walked up the massive marble stairs to the first floor. A long corridor ran the length of the whole of the buildings. Doors opened out to the billiard rooms, card rooms, offices of the administrative, lounges, dining rooms, etc.

The second floor was the ladies' precincts. The third floor were suites of offices: the Kine-Cameramen's Society, the Film Press Club, Willie Clarkson, Rayne's the costumier, as well as a cluster of offices rented by club members—directors, stars, and others—for business purposes.

On the fourth floor were reading rooms, writing rooms, make-up rooms, rehearsal rooms, large kinema theatre for Trade shows, etc.

And everywhere—life.

That is the impression that Gerald obtained—Life. This film profession was a living thing. It pulsed. It was mobile. It was animate. It was as sure and settled as the Thrones of Eternity.

"This is the biggest club in the world now," remarked W. G. "The Gleam Room Club closed about four years ago—it was the last dying kick of the theatrical profession (there are only two of the old-fashioned 'speaking' theatres in London, and only five in England now), and the Savage and the Garrick and the Eccentric Clubs are small and very exclusive affairs. Here at this club there is something happening every hour—a Trade show, or a concert, or a rehearsal, or a dance, or a dinner, or a lecture, or an interview, or photographs for the Press. On the second floor are a suite of offices for the use of pressmen only—results: see to-day's newspapers. . . . Oh, by the way, let us call in at the Kinema Press Buildings."

A few steps up Long Acre brought them to a huge building at the corner of Endell Street.

"Oh, John Bull offices!" exclaimed Gerald, with delight.

"The late offices of John Bull, you mean," said W. G. "John Bull took over the big premises of a rival concern in Farringdon Street about eighteen months ago, and these premises are now given over to all the periodicals issued in connection with films. They are still owned and controlled by the same firm that owns John Bull, and all the staffs are expert film journalists. We can pop in and see some of them—I know 'em all."

Inside, W. G. took Gerald into a suite of wonderful offices: heavy carpets, massive desks on wonderfully carved legs, diffused lighting around the four walls, hydraulic "messengers" for sending copy to the printers, etc.

"These are the editorial offices of the Kinematograph Daily, which is a morning paper full of kinematograph news. It sprung from the old Kinematograph Weekly, whose place is now taken by the Kinema, an old rival of the Kine Weekly, which this firm has acquired, revolutionised, and converted into a really powerful Trade organ. Through this passage, and over there, the whole left wing of the building is given over to the Motion Picture Studio, which is as big in size as the Kine, and quite as useful and successful. Up above are the offices of the "Fan" papers—Pictures, the Picture-goer, Film Fiction, Flicker Fun (a film 'comic'), and several others. . . . You will see that the main principle of the British film-producing industry is centralisation, and as a conclusive proof let us jump in a taxi and go to Kingsbury."

An hour later Gerald was being shown over the Studio City at Kingsbury.

"About ten years ago," W. G. explained, "British films were placed in an impregnable position by the formation of the British National Film League. This eventually became an amalgamation of all British film-producing concerns, and the league built this wonderful city, which far outshines the old Los Angeles that used to obtain before you met with your accident. Here, you see, is a collection of twenty-two studios, all owned and controlled by the league. They are rented by producing con-

ACTION AND SUSPENSE

by HENRY EDWARDS

As a director of films, it has been my lot to read all sorts and conditions of scenarios, and the more I read, the more I realise the difficulties that confront the scenario writer when he sets out to tell a story in the language of actions, which the heart must read from pictures on the screen. There are many stories to be told, but not every story can be told in pictures.

This, I fear, is the great stumbling block: that so many subjects are chosen which are unsuitable for the medium of expression at our disposal. How, then, shall we decide which story is the most suitable? Only by carefully dramatising our facts before we employ them. We must visualise our story so that it can be told in the things our characters do; we must build it so that situations arise compelling our characters to do certain things, but always their actions must be logical and from the audience's point of view—inevitable.

This brings me to perhaps the strongest truth the scenario writer can keep before him—that it is the primary function of drama to entertain. The hope that something will happen will not hold an audience for long; therefore, we must so construct our story that suspense is created—suspense is the dread that something may happen, and it is on this that we must build our story.

We must so construct it, that by careful preparation impending difficulties or dangers are looming up before our characters. We must show the audience these dangers, and keep our characters ignorant of them until the proper moment; and it is the nearing of the danger to the blissfully ignorant character, making us long to cry out and warn him, that gives suspense. Let us take an example:—

The scene is near a tumble-down shed on a hillside, with here and there an empty box about, and a general assortment of rubbish. Tired and hungry, our hero wanders in and, seating himself, rests awhile. In searching his pockets for food, he finds a cigarette—he lights it, and casts the burning match to the ground. The cigarette keeps off the pangs of hunger for a while, and, with renewed strength, he rises and leaves the picture.

No sooner has he gone than the burning match ignites the dried rubbish about, and the box on which he sat explodes with enormous force.

He had been sitting on dynamite used for blasting the hill-side.

Here is a case in which there is expectancy, and never for a moment suspense, because the audience does not know of the impending danger to the character.

Now let us defy the critics who clamour for "surprise" in film construction, and tell the incident in the language of the screen.

When the quarrymen went away some time before, they left behind them a box of dynamite used for blasting the rocks. We have seen previously the enormous explosive force of even a small quantity from one of these boxes. Our hero has dragged himself to the quarry districts. He enters as in the previous incident, and rests upon the apparently empty box, which the audience knows contains sufficient dynamite to blow him to glory.

As before, he searches his pockets for food, and finds a cigarette; as before, he lights it, and casts the burning match to the ground, but with how much greater significance. While he is enjoying his smoke, and feeling less the pangs of hungry, the match is catching the dried grass and rubbish, which will lead to his destruction. It becomes a question as to which will take the longer, the hero to recover his strength and go, or the box of dynamite to explode.

Here is sheer suspense, and when the hero has gone it is no jar to the audience, but rather a pleasurable expectancy to see the box explode harmlessly in the air.

I do not claim the germ of this idea to be original, but it serves to show the difference between expectancy and suspense. It is melodramatic, but the principles governing it apply equally to the slightest incident, and if we are to make a story interesting from beginning to end, we cannot disregard the apparently trivial things. They make for light and shade in a picture, and are vital to a climax.

At the very commencement of our picture we must find an incident that will serve the purpose of helping our characterisation.

It is not sufficient to say in a leader "John Jones," and then show a picture of our hero. For the audience, knowing nothing of John Jones, cares less.

They had no lead; nothing compels them to watch with interest the doings of John Jones; let us tell more than the scene that follows it can convey. Let us show something that has gone before the opening of our story as follows:—

"John always knew when he had had enough, but the taste of it had got into his blood, and his outlook on life was 'What does it matter?'"

We have now some interest in John's efforts to fight drink. We will take the scene to be a public-house bar. He walks down the line of the floor-boards towards us, and only staggers from it at the last moment. The other character tries to persuade him that he is all right, and presses another drink on him, but John refuses; he knows better. At this moment a new interest is introduced in the person of John's long absent brother. They are great chums, these two, and drinks are purchased. In the great delight of seeing his brother again, yet knowing he has had enough, John struggles as to whether he shall drink or not. Then in his face we read "What does it matter?" and he drinks to his brother's return. It is this last drink that takes him over the mark, and again his resolutions are broken.

Here is an instance when the leader creates suspense. It tells us that John is conscious of his failing, and indicates his weakness, giving the audience the hope that he may overcome it; that he doesn't make a situation from which further action is demanded, and so a trivial incident serves its purpose in building towards an inevitable climax—and creating suspense.

"WHAT'S the good of a film comedian making resolutions when ten minutes afterwards he might break his neck? If I make one, it will be to give my directors a good run for their money before they collect my insurance—in fact I think I'll resolve that they'll never get it; it would be a safe life for me if I did."—WALTER FORDE.

"To show the British public that a woman's influence, if exercised in the right direction, can be a tremendous benefit to British films."—VIOLET HOPSON.

"To get every facility for film making that I require—no matter how many members of the police force dislike me."—KENELM FOSS.

"SITTING in front of the fire, slipper dangling on my foot, while I watch the tongues of flame dancing about in the blazing coal, I wonder what will be my New Year resolution. . . . We all expect so much of the year to come, that one must do a little bit to deserve as much as one wishes. Of course, we all know that, when it comes to realisation . . . but this is another story; we are not talking about the end of the Year, but the beginning of the New One! Hard thing to think of a New Year resolution! . . . The trouble is not to stick to the resolution, but to find one . . . all the good ones have been thought of, and the bad ones had better be left alone. . . . What shall I resolve myself to do . . . or not to do? . . . Could anyone suggest anything, to apply to someone else? . . . There, I have it, the best resolution, one so much to my heart, would be to tell others what they have got to do . . . and what a better world it would be then! . . . Still, no, I am afraid it would not work very well. Oh, for a Resolution, really all mine, to apply to my personal case. . . . No luck! Well, carry on as before; be fair and play the game, keep on trying to do my very best and hoping all the time the fellow next to me, the one in front and the other behind, are all doing the same. . . . And my hand is itching for the handle, the handle which will grind my best pictures, the Pictures of the New Year."—L. G. EGROT.

"RESOLUTIONS are made to be broken—at least I suppose so. I usually break mine about twenty-four hours after the New Year has dawned; so my resolution for 1922 will be: 'Not to be persuaded to make any.'"—STEWART ROME.

* * *

"I KEPT my last New Year's resolution until December 25. I had to give it up then in order to re-new it for 1922. It takes a tremendous amount of will-power to keep mine, because one does not begin to appreciate bed until it is time to get up; and my little resolve is to rise each morning not later than 6.30 a.m., even when I am not filming."—VICTOR McLAGLAN.

"I'M determined not to make any resolutions for 1922. On January 3, 1921, I lost five pounds on my last New Year resolution, and I've hated the word ever since."—CLIVE BROOK.

"MY New Year resolution is to keep all my New Year resolutions, one of which is to continue reading your excellent paper."—CHRISSIE WHITE.

"ON New Year's Eve I shall say to myself: 'John Stuart, 1-9-2-2 makes 14; fourteen is your lucky number; it will be a year full of opportunities. If the opportunities are not forthcoming, you must determine not to be disappointed.'"—JOHN STUART.

* * *

"To cheer me on my journey through 1922, I shall resolve to become an optimist, and to think of the things that might have been—if only I had not been Lewis Willoughby."—LEWIS WILLOUGHBY.

* * *

"To improve my photographic work; to steady myself in relation to time, and not get cross if it takes long, so long as I get the goods; not to stand surety for any cameraman who borrows from a moneylender, especially when the other surety is also a cameraman and both let me in for the lot! (Once bit—Verb. sap.) ; to renew my subscription to THE MOTION PICTURE STUDIO."—EMILE LAUSTE.

* * *

"MY 'resolution'? But why in the singular? The Kine, might be large enough to contain my list of resolutions. Anyhow, if I am confined to one resolution it shall be: 'That I always pay my Kinema Club subscription directly it falls due.'"—ADRIAN BRUNEL.

ON WRITING SCENARIOS

III.—Analysis of the Scenario

by GERTRUDE M. ALLEN

And now we have arrived at the stage of technicalities! Euclid, the Science of the Heavenly Bodies, or the enmeshing problems of politics would seem, to the novice, to be food for infantile studies in comparison to the construction of a technically perfect scenario!

But, as the old lady said to the dentist, "Tain't so bad as the hinstuments makes yer think it is . . . and the pain's soon over!"

So we will study the first rules of construction with a courageous heart, for the first rules are the vital ones, and the consequential ones will automatically create—and solve—themselves.

We will assume that the scenario writer wants to interpret, in black and white, a scene already visually conceived. That the scene represents the heroine entering her drawing-room, shortly followed by a maid, who delivers her a note, which the heroine makes it her business to read—and that the contents of the note are to be divulged to the audience.

That, in itself, sounds a perfectly simple proceeding, and, in the abstract, it is. But to write it into a scenario in technical perfection, is a more lengthy and complicated task than it seems on its face value.

The following is a fair replica of the incident as it would appear in a finished scenario:—

Scene. A Drawing-room.

Isabella enters. Walks languidly towards settee and sits down. Turns as maid enters and hands her a letter, which she takes. Maid exits. Isabella looks critically at the letter, then a smile of satisfaction slowly dispels the languor and she looks intensely interested. Opens letter, and commences to read it. . . .

Cut-in of portion of a written letter on screen, as follows:—

. . . and so, my dear Isabella, we should be charmed if you would come along and join us. Leonard Charteris, your old friend, will be one of the party.

Your devoted,
Miriam.

Back to Scene.

Isabella displays a good deal of satisfaction over the epistle, and, rising briskly from the settee, goes over to the escritoire and starts to write her reply.

Now, it has been my unfortunate lot to read many alleged "scenarios," and for the benefit of instructive comparisons, I will reproduce this incident as the uninitiated would write it.

"Isabella is very tired of life and getting rather desperate when she receives a letter from her friend, Miriam, asking her to come and join a house-party, and telling her that the guests will include one Leonard Charteris, who is an old friend of Isabella. Naturally, Isabella is very pleased with the invitation and accepts it."

This is, if anything, a more lucid explanation of the scene than a novice generally gives, but, as the camera claims no psychic powers, and the producer is only capable of getting his artistes to interpret actualities, it is impossible to re-tell such an incident as this without showing on the screen the contents of that letter. Therefore, the letter must be written into the scene, and the above example shows the correct way of doing it.

Another very fatal, and very common, error is that of jumbling up a whole series of different activities on the part of the characters, under the heading of one individual scene. For example:—

A Library.

The Squire is reading a book. The old butler, very agitated, and apparently the bearer of unpleasant news, stands hesitating and afraid outside the library door—trying to pluck up sufficient courage to enter. He eventually does so, and just as he is imparting the news to the Squire, the happy, mischievous face of the Squire's daughter appears at the window.

To interpret this incident on the screen, the director would find it necessary to take it from four different angles—which means that four different portions of film stock are exposed at four different times, and the camera moved to four different positions. So that, were this scene written up correctly, it would be four scenes in the scenario, and not one. The correct version is as follows:—

Scene. A Library.

The Squire is reading a book. All serene.

Scene. Exterior of Library door.

The old butler is standing, hesitant—rather afraid to enter. His attitude suggests that he bears bad news, and is loath to go in and impart it to the Squire.

Scene. Library (as before).

The Squire still reading, unconscious of impending trouble. The butler enters, timidly. Approaches the Squire and commences to talk to him. The Squire's face assumes a seriousness which is eloquent of his reception of the butler's news.

Scene. Close-up view of the Library window.

The smiling, mischievous face of the Squire's pretty daughter appears at the window. She peers in to see that her father is there, then disappears again.

These few examples will prove that the first rudiments of the art are the power to visualise action in its right environment, and to write it down with due deference to the limits of the camera.

A modern scenario often contains three hundred scenes, but, as will be obvious from the above illustration, one small incident sometimes requires three or four scenes to be played.

Every time you move your characters from one spot to another you move your "location"—and it is another scene. A picture play is never produced as written—that is, the scenes are not taken consecutively, and sometimes the final scene in the story will be photographed before the first one has been "set!" So it is essential that a thoroughly intelligible continuity should be written up, so that when the director starts work on a new film he can choose any one scene from among the three hundred, photograph it, and "shelve" it until it is time to "join it up" with the others.

Apart from the recording of action, there is the very difficult and important task of title-writing. I shall deal comprehensively with this subject in next week's article on "The Function of the Sub-Title."

MARY ODETTE MAKES A RESOLUTION

I HAVE made up my mind to do no film or theatre work this year—I am going to sit down in my dressing-room at the Comedy Theatre, and ask Leon M. Lion to drop into my lap the legendary thousand or thousands which all actresses are supposed to earn weekly. I will then receive in my dressing-room all the people who come to the stage door and ask to see me, because they want me to get them "on the films," or to get them a job at the theatre—to interview directors and managers on their behalf—write letters of introduction for them—and, in fact, do all the spade work of lifting them gratis into what they consider "an easy and lucrative profession." In between whiles, I will be dropping out of the thousands in my lap—sovereigns into collecting boxes brought round by representatives of vague charities—subscribing to every wild scheme under the sun. More serious sums must be given to all the (to me) unknown film and theatre artistes out of work (genuine and otherwise) who each imagine that they are the only one, and not one of hundreds, asking me to keep them out of my salary. Probably after this I shall just have time to catch the last train home—after carefully explaining to Mr. Lion that I do not come to the theatre to work for my employers—but to attend to other people's interests. When I arrive home I will then tackle all the letters, autograph-albums, scenarios, requests for photos, advise how to get on the films, free seats for the theatre, parcels of clothing or monetary help for correspondents, or their near or distant relations (no stamps enclosed for return postage or carriage only the demand for an immediate reply). By this time I shall have no money left and only the clothes I am wearing. If I have the luck to get an offer of film work while at the theatre, and can make the same arrangement with the director as with Mr. Lion, I may be able to deduct a small portion of the thousands, for rent and food. It is generally supposed that actors and actresses do not require commonplace necessities. After a time I expect that directors may find me a rather unprofitable employee, so I will then try to get a job in an office (government or charity organisation preferred).

COME RIGHT IN!

If you are passing, or if you want to ask a question, or if you have some news, or if you want to have a chat over the business—come right in! We are anxious to maintain close personal touch with all our readers. We are putting you first all the time—you and your interests are our chief concern, and we want to emphasise that you have a perfect right to come in and regard our time as being at your disposal. Come right in!

NEW IDEAS FOR THE NEW YEAR

by STEWART ROME

Times have changed—so has the policy of film production.

The store house of good filmable literature has been ransacked, and to-day directors are at their wits' ends to find new stories. And here I think is an example of the old methods holding sway.

There must be dozens of people in this country who have ideas for film stories—certainly they know nothing of screen technique because they have never had the opportunity to study studio conditions at first hand. Fired with ambition they put their ideas on paper, and send them to a film company. They wait weeks, sometimes months, before they receive a reply from the scenario editor—sometimes they never hear the fate of their story, despite repeated applications for a decision.

In nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, the story is rejected—perhaps it has never even been read. May there not be many good ideas—though they may be crude, they might serve as a foundation for others—missed in this way?

Recently a friend told me that his son, who had just left school, was anxious to take up camera work. He asked my advice on the matter—as to what course he should follow to apprentice his son to such a business.

Candidly, I could give him no advice at all. For it seems to me that although there are a number of cameramen who have served long apprenticeships, many of them seem just to happen. Even though my friend was willing to pay a fee for his son's training, I could suggest no channel through which this training might be acquired.

Another department in which I think there is room for great improvement is the titling department. Would it not be advisable to train intelligent youngsters in this type of work? In my opinion titling can help tremendously in making a success of a film, and the titles on some of our English films at the present time, are, to say the least of it, disheartening.

Not only in these departments I have already mentioned does there seem a lack of new ideas, but in many others as well. Occasionally we hear of a new player who makes a big success in a certain film—but even though the critics and public have sung his or her praises, this is no guarantee that the artiste will go on up the ladder that leads to stardom.

Directors will probably say that the player in question was suited only to a certain type of part—and other parts suitable have not arisen. Well, then, if the player is worth while, why not have special stories written for the player, instead of finding the story and then the artistes? Critics may say that the story's the thing, but in my experience the public selects its favourite players, and whether the story be good or mediocre, they will follow the star every time!

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

Hugh E. Wright, in addition to his recognised histrionic ability, is a skilled wielder of the pen. By the courtesy of the Actor we are able to reproduce, in serial form, one of Hugh's literary effusions.

CHAPTER III.

"SOME" DIRECTOR.

Just then an alert little man in shirt sleeves came up and planted himself firmly in front of Alice.

"Gee! What is it?" he said, through his nose.

"Seventh letter of the alphabet," said Alice quickly. She had just started Pelmanism and was rather proud of it.

But the little man was taking no notice. "Alice! Gee!" he exclaimed, while the dawn of a great recognition lit up his mobile features. (It takes an American to do that properly.) "I ought to have recognised you. Gee! I'm a mutt!" Alice looked anxiously round for Jeff, but she couldn't see him anywhere. "Why, I know you. You were next to Gray's 'Energy in a Mausoleum' in 'Snippets from the World's Best Literature for Two Dollars.' Well, little old England didn't do so bad when she turned you out."

"But she hasn't turned me out," said Alice, "or, at least, I hope not."

The little man ignored her, and went on: "But they had to go to the U.S.A. to get you on the screen. They had to come to Henry J. Senna for that. Guess you must be just about slopping over with pride to be meetin' me like this."

"I don't think I'm slopping over," said Alice. "If only you'd go in for Pelmanism and not guess so much I think you'd do better."

The little man was immersed in his favourite subject, himself, and took no notice whatever. "You can shake if you like," he said, and held out his hand.

Alice wasn't quite sure she did like, but she put her hand out, and immediately found it enveloped in his bony clasp, shaken vigorously and dropped again.

"Now I guess you can go round braggin' that you've shaken hands with Henry J. Senna, the World's greatest Director!"

It seemed to Alice that he was getting a little bit peeved. "I am the only Director that has to have three brass bands playing before he can get an inspiration. And sometimes not even then," he added, a trifle gloomily, Alice thought.

"Three brass bands," she said admiringly.

"They collect my thoughts," said the little man proudly.

"I see," said Alice, "when they slop over." The Director looked at her suspiciously. "They must be a great help," she added hastily.

"I don't know that they are really," admitted the Director. "But when you're earning the money I am you've got to do something out of the ordinary."

"You couldn't just direct?" suggested Alice.

He looked at her in amazement. "Just direct!" he muttered. "Gee! that's some notion! Just direct! 'Out of the mouths of boobs and suckers.' But, no, it wouldn't do. It's too iconoclastic. And yet there might be money in it one day. Say, little lady, how did you think of that? Just direct!"

"I don't quite know. It just came, I think," said Alice, feeling rather pleased with herself without knowing why.

"What you want is food," said the Director firmly. "Stay here a minute while I get my coat."

He darted off, and was back, putting his coat on, well within scheduled time. Then he took Alice by the arm, and they walked off together in the direction of lunch. He started talking again almost immediately.

"That idea of yours," he began, "was good, Kid, but it was wrong. There is only one way to win success. You've got to tell all the world all you can do, all you think you can do, and all you know you can't do, all the time."

"That doesn't leave you much time for really doing anything, does it?" asked Alice.

"You don't have to," he answered. "You hire somebody! And even then there are disappointments. Look at the greatest work I ever directed. It took me six months, hired by your Government at that. A Propaganda Film that would have stopped the war."

"And didn't it?" said Alice.

"No!" snapped the Director. "Your fool Government hires a lot of soldiers and guns and things, and stops the durned war before I'm ready. But you know the salary they gave me," he added with a touch of pride.

"I afraid I don't," said Alice.

"Don't you ever read the papers?" he asked.

"Only Little Folks and the Girl's Own Paper," Alice admitted.

"Little Folks!" the Director repeated. "I must remember that. And it wasn't there? I can see my Press Agent gettin' fired over this. Come in here!"

They were passing an open door at that moment, and, seizing her by the arm, the Director pulled her through and slammed the door. It was a very dark little room, lit only by a red lamp. Alice felt a wee bit afraid.

"Listen!" said the Director, and went on in a low voice:—

"I sent a message to the firm,

I told them, 'This is what I earn.'
You don't think it matters it not rhyming," said the Director. "It's so absolutely true, you know."

Alice thought it didn't matter for once, and the Director went on:—

"They sent reply, they didn't fuss,
They simply said, 'But not with us!'
I sent a letter pretty stiff,
I wrote it down myself. 'But if—'
They sent an answer back, those men,
It simply read, 'Not even then!'
I wrote my next in Double Dutch,
Translated, it just read, 'How much?'
They wrote in Hebrew, straight and flat—
'Well, rather less than half of that!'

I sent a message to the firm,
'Well, this is what I say I earn!'
They answered back the following day,
'That's all right if you only say.'
And what I say I earn I say
In every paper every day."

"What do you really earn exactly?" said Alice, as the Director appeared to have finished.

"Rather less than half of that," said the Director, a trifle sadly. "But nobody knows what I really earn except me—even the Managing Director doesn't know—he only thinks I earn it."

He opened the door, and they went out into the light again. "I haven't recited poetry since I was so high," murmured the Director. It seemed to Alice that he was actually blushing, but I'm not sure that that isn't impossible. Anyhow, he didn't say any more till they reached—

SCREEN VALUES
MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT"All Roads Lead to Calvary."H. W. Thompson.—Starring Minna Grey, Bertram Burleigh, and Mary Odette.
Directed by Kenelm Foss—Scenario by Kenelm Foss.

CONSIDERED by itself, as a screen entertainment, "All Roads Lead to Calvary" is among the best; but the many admirers of Jerome K. Jerome's novel will feel the disappointment which is usual in the case of adaptations—or even more. It does not matter that the plot has been altered, that the question of war is entirely omitted, and that many incidents have an entirely different significance—such alterations are inevitable in adaptation—but it is regrettable that the characters as a whole have been cheapened.

Jerome depicts four idealists deliberately choosing the difficult road of martyrdom. In the film they are little more than puppets moved by circumstances, with, at best, a conventional sense of duty or propriety.

It is, however, quite a good story of quite ordinary (and quite real) people. There is no exceptionally dramatic point in it; but the main idea, though not quite Jerome's, is interesting, consistently kept in view, and well worked out. There is nothing exceptional either in the pictorial quality; but all the scenes have been very well judged by Kenelm Foss as scenarist and director with a view to their artistic as well as their story value.

* * *

It is the good acting throughout that keeps "All Roads Lead to Calvary" from being commonplace. Having real and commonplace people to act, every artiste fulfills his or her part with practical perfection.

Bertram Burleigh as the fisherman passionately moved by high ideals, mingled with personal ambition, is very fine indeed.

Minna Grey, as a woman gradually degenerating owing to her sense of uselessness, combined with impotent jealousy, gives an exceedingly interesting and convincing study.

It is not Mary Odette's fault that the character of the heroine is not clearly defined. Joan in the book is an unusual and very clearly drawn individual. In the film she is merely a type—any young girl with artistic ambition and personal feelings conflicting, as well as the sense of duty and the instinct of love. Mary Odette presents this type with her usual charm, sympathy, insight and artistic finish.

Little Julie Kean is inclined to be mechanical at times, but is generally very good, and seems to have a thorough understanding of the part of the hero's daughter.

J. Nelson Ramsay, George Travers, Lorna Rathbone, Kate Gurney, and Roy Travers all perform their parts with thoroughly good art, and Madame Goimbault (generally known as "Mrs. Odette") makes an effective and appropriate leading figure in one of the crowds.

David Hallett, as the young and hopeless lover, gives an exceptionally interesting and well-considered study.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Excellent.

LEADS: Exceptionally good.

SUPPORTS: Very good.

LITERARY: Scenario smoothly working, but without much grip.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Generally very good.

LIGHTING: Faulty occasionally, but generally very good.

INTERIORS: Appropriate, without being lavish.

EXTERIORS: Picturesque, without being striking.

A QUESTION OF CLOSE-UPS

In the art of the screen, are close-ups necessary? Are they dramatically wrong in principle? If so, why? And why are they often badly photographed; usually over-exposed?

These are questions that will have to be faced and dealt with sooner or later by directors and cameramen. A writer in the Toronto Mail refers to this matter, and his remarks are of special interest.

To my mind, says this writer, the screen picture is closely akin to its inanimate brethren of the art gallery, inasmuch as inspection at too close range brings out the blighting crudities of canvas, colours and form. Standing within a couple of feet of an oil painting, one is overwhelmed by its shapelessness. It has the appearance of one huge smear, of a conglomeration of colours thrown indiscriminately and allowed to settle at will and stay there to perplex and confound man's mental and optical senses.

But step back a few feet and note the change. The hodge-podge of colours begins to take form, the various tints resolve themselves into distinct units, or blend harmoniously with each other. A little further back, and the picture itself is in detail. Gone now are the coarse threads of the canvas, and the eye is greeted by a work of art, a thing of beauty.

So with the close-up. The nearer one is to the screen, the coarser and more unlovely is the picture to the human eye. It is no libel to state that American directors of poor taste and judgment are to blame for the abominable and hideous caricatures flashed upon the screen under the technical title of "close-ups."

I studied the matter closely, and soon came to the conclusion that the close-up, as used by the American director, was really an abuse, and that 65 per cent. of American picture plays consisted of this objectionable element.

So accustomed had I become to this 65 per cent. abuse and 35 per cent. picture that when British films were introduced in Toronto I felt the lack of something that, at that time, I could not explain. I analysed the pictures, and found that the semi-close-up had been largely substituted for the close-up—and with the best results. I saw then more than ever how unnecessary was the close-up "abused" by the American directors.

It was in "Possession"—a Hepworth picture, by the way—that I noticed more particularly this welcome repression of the close-up. Where the average American production is "choppy," "Possession," due to the judicious use of the semi-close-up, ran along with the easy rhythm of an unbroken stream, and I found that I could sit back in my seat and enjoy the picture to the full, comfortably confident that my ecstasy would not be rudely interrupted, and my nerves shocked by the sudden appearance on the screen of the grimacing physiognomy of my favourite artiste.

 This subject is of great interest and utmost importance, and we invite readers to send us their views on the questions asked in the opening paragraph.

TINTING TROUBLES

Most of the coloured motion pictures which are exhibited at the present time are tinted, and it is customary to tint night scenes a deep blue, scenes including fire are tinted red, while those showing interiors of rooms or warm sunlight are frequently tinted yellow.

These tints have in general been obtained by immersing the positive print in tanks containing the dye, so that the gelatine of the emulsion took the dye up from the solution.

The tinting of films, however, has always presented difficulties. The varying quality of dyes on the market tended to produce a lack of uniformity between different batches of the film.

Films tinted on racks often showed unevenness and streaks, which occur unless great precautions are taken. Streaking is caused by the bleeding of the dye from the gelatine during the period between rinsing after dyeing and the placing of the film on the drying racks.

Any drops of water on the surface of the film become more or less saturated with dye, and these, after drying, remain as spots and irregular markings which are very apparent on the screen.

cerns for as long as a production may last. The cast is obtained through La Agencie, which also has all the locations in Europe photographed and filed. There is now only one serious competitor with England, and that is the German picture, but this competition is good for all concerned. The American-producing industry 'went west' exactly three years after the League was formed — only 'tuppenny-gaff' kinema theatres show American pictures, whereas all the largest and best American and British kinemas show nothing but British films. The old trouble was the block-book-ing system, but this killed itself because it was often only a questionable dodge to unload nine 'dud' pictures because of the existence of one good one. Nowadays a film is finished to-day, Trade shown next week, and having its first public run the week after, other bookings being made while the first run proceeds."

All this time Gerald had been endeavouring to master his astonishment, but could succeed no longer.

"Ye gods!" he exclaimed, "So the kinema profession really has become a great, serious profession. The last time I acted before the camera few of us really took the profession seriously, and we who did half thought that we were on a bad egg: that the profession would crumble to pieces and leave us stranded. And now I see it as a huge national enterprise, bringing success and prosperity to all engaged in it. . . . Tell me, Mr. Talkner, what is the reason for this wonderful change for the better?"

They had stopped in their walk. W. G. laid a hand on the arm of his agitated companion and looked gravely into his eyes as he said:

"About ten years ago at the commencement of a New Year, everybody in the profession, seeing how precarious it was becoming, vowed a resolution . . . and kept it."

"What was the resolution?"

"To sink all petty jealousies and small-minded practices, and to co-operate in one sincere and desperate effort to swing the profession from doubt to success and prosperity. . . . It was a last gamble . . . and it came off."—H. S.

KINEMA CLUB NEWS

Owing to the fact that the builders and furnishers could not finish their work by Christmas, it was decided to cancel the house-warming in favour of a formal official opening of the entire club. This will take place on January 19, and will probably take the character of a dinner, with a musical programme.

Members and others will be interested to know that the premises are now assuming a real club-like appearance, and that the builders will be out by the end of this coming week.

We are asked to announce that it is of utmost importance that all members forward their subscriptions at once, as the initial expenses are very heavy indeed. The annual subscription for foundation members (i.e., those who apply before January 5) is three guineas. After that date the subscription will be raised to five guineas. Those who can, will greatly assist the club if they will subscribe as a life member. The payment of twenty guineas covers membership for life.

Sir Oswald Stoll has consented to be the first president of the club, and we congratulate the Executive Committee on having been successful in securing such an invaluable head to the club affairs.

It is encouraging to the committee to receive the gifts that have been sent to the hon. secretary. These include pictures, curtains, a marble clock, and other things for the decoration of the premises. It is hoped that further gifts will follow.

SIR OSWALD STOLL
First President of the Kinema Club

Decalogue for 1922.

I.—Thou shalt not imagine that thou art the only pebble on the film beach or the only member of the cast.

II.—If thou art a director thou shalt not have favourites, nor shalt thou neglect the lesser members of thy cast.

III.—Remember thy cameraman and be thou not too high and mighty to take his advice.

IV.—When thou hast a part to play thou shouldst do thy best, be the part large or walk-on.

V.—Thou shalt not neglect to see that thine artistes have decent dressing-room accommodation.

VI.—Thou shalt not forget that artistes canst not live by make-up alone, but that they require a lunch soon after noon.

VII.—If thou art a cameraman thou shouldst not accept liquid refreshment from a player in anticipation of providing him with unfair prominence in thy pictures.

VIII.—Thou shalt not allow thy press agent to send out publicity that would insult the intelligence of a kindergarten.

IX.—When thou dost send out thy "calls" thou shouldst be sure that there will be work for the artistes when they arrive at the studio, peradventure they may refuse work for which they would have been paid. Moreover, thou shouldst pay them their full salary for the day so wasted.

X.—Let the managing director remember that he canst not expect an A1 film from a C3 expenditure; further, that he shouldst not practise false economy on the director, nor his sets, nor his locations, nor his raw negative, nor anything that is his.

The Historical Film must be accurately dressed.

We Stock Civil and Military costumes of all known periods. :: ::

"The Call of the Road" and "The Old Curiosity Shop," with their wealth of costume, detail and characteristics of their times, were dressed by us.

The Silent Drama.

WITH the accent on the adjective! For it appears that film actors who return to the stage are experiencing some difficulty—so we are told by the Stage—in reciting their lines. Film actors who have not spoken a line of dialogue in public are now applying to theatre managers seeking engagements because they find offers of picture productions are getting fewer. One actor I know, says this writer, got back to the stage, and on the third night had to go home—he had lost his voice from want of public use! There are also many famous picture actors who, being “out” now, want to start as “legits.” To the film player who has never had stage experience the opportunity to face an audience is a very great temptation. Frequently stars in pictures totally neglect their voices, or possibly never had any!

“Caught in the Slump.”

AS we have constantly reiterated in these columns, this writer points out that by intelligent concentration upon the selection of stories that will picture well, regardless of stars, and a generally better sense of selection and rejection on the part of renters and exhibitors, the present depression and further embarrassments may be avoided by those film companies that have been caught in the great slump. To-day the public is more exacting in its demands than it was. Teeming with human dramas of all sorts—poignant, startling, extraordinary—as was the great war, the struggle educated the public, but not the kinema people. What at one time passed for stories of engrossing complication seem empty, stale, and uninteresting to-day, with the higher standards for truth, strength, curiosity, and thrills that the war-time created. Some few of our producing firms are slowly realising this outstanding fact—and these will survive—the others will either disappear or only live to cater for the penny-show patrons.

Sense and Nonsense.

ARTHUR WEIGALL who writes the film notes in the Daily Mail has certainly put his foot well into it over his remarks respecting the native wisdom of British exhibitors. But his remarks on British films are a little more sound. He tells the exhibitor that he has to give over booking American films and take British made over. “Somebody has got to make the first break away; and I feel that the exhibitor must do it, even though it cost him his last penny. Let him always remember the great example of the London General Omnibus Company, which was faced with disaster, scrapped its horse omnibuses, went on to starvation rations, two statements by different critics which, read side by side, are certainly a good get-away from the senseless panegyrics that often fly about unheeded: “The kinematograph, for all its technical excellence, cannot really be a complete substitute for a play or a novel. . . . But cinematography is . . . faced with special difficulties when it is led to present the spiritual in the form of mere matter in motion!” and “why those ‘close-ups’ where an actress, deprived of speech, is given instead a face five feet high, and called upon to express with it the extreme emotions of love or dread or hate? Why those funny little sentences of print to explain the obvious? Why indeed the whole ‘domestic drama’ . . . when it could all be done so much better on the stage?”

The Literary Aspect.

THE special article by Rafael Sabatini will be read with great interest by all within the profession as well as a great number of litterateurs all over the country. The same subject has been dealt with, from another angle, of course, by Max Pemberton, who, in the Era says:—

“If a man be successful as a novelist or playwright, it is obvious that concentration will soon make of him a successful writer for the screen. It is largely a question of selection and of adaptation. He will perceive quickly that his people must be doing rather than thinking. The enraptured dream of an agonised heroine must take the form not of meditation but of movement, and if she does not walk in the incarnadined snow of the old-time comedian, at least she must get busy among the furniture. Soon the writer discovers that much which ‘happens off’ and is negligible in book or novel is of the greatest value upon the screen. He does not tell his audience that the hero has been kicked to death by a mule—he endeavours to persuade the mule to do the needful coram populo. ‘Master Charles not home again,’—but what happened to Master Charles at the party is obviously of value”

Kinema Club Notices

IN deference to the wishes of many members of the Club it has been decided not to celebrate the Club opening with a dinner as it is felt that the expense would preclude many taking part. The opening will take place on Sunday, January 22, at 6.30 p.m., and will be followed by a musical program, an informal dance and a social evening, at a very nominal charge.

THOSE intending to be present should fill in the form on page 14 or communicate with the Hon. Secretary so that the catering arrangements can be completed.

Q All members who have not paid their first year's subscriptions are urged to do so at once. This is of utmost importance. Cheques to be made payable to “The Kinema Club,” and sent to the Hon. Secretary at 93, Long Acre, W.C.2.

built motor-omnibuses, and triumphed. The British exhibitor has got to scrap the American “program-picture”—that is to say, the ordinary film which is not outstanding or particularly remarkable in any way. That kind of picture is killing the whole business over here because it does not offer any attraction or thrill to outweigh the disadvantage of its un-English atmosphere, and I say this direct to Sir William Jury and other renters who deal largely in these foreign goods.”

Close-ups.

ELSEWHERE in this issue the question of close-ups is keenly and intelligently debated. It may help the discussion to reproduce the remarks of a literary monthly, the Bookman's Journal, on this same subject. It quotes

LAST YEAR'S BRITISH FILMS

The past year, though disastrous in many ways both to exhibitors and distributors, has for British directors been a period of quite unusual success and of exceptional promise for the future. It is not merely that the status of the native film is to-day infinitely higher than it was in January, 1921; its advance has been accompanied by a definite loss of average merit in the American subjects, which are its chief competitors.

Although the "average" British film is still far behind the American, the much smaller number of home producers are issuing a much greater proportion of films of unusual character than their rivals; that they are gradually capturing the artistic initiative, and, when they have perfected their technique, are certain to secure the leading position in their own market.

This result, in some measure, arises out of the very shortcomings of British production. Highly organised studios, specialised and tacles, he would be compelled to pay more attention to material than to presentation; he has no stars of sufficiently wide appeal to "put over" any sort of stories, and he has in a sense been forced into originality. At all events, the 1921 output shows that he has achieved it.

Nothing in the American output had the originality of "The Fifth Form at St. Dominics," made in a small studio by a director with probably considerably less money at hand than any one of the six or more directors working side by side at an hectic speed on an American "floor." Nothing with the heart appeal of "Squibs" came from the States; it was the product of a studio which the Americans would count insignificant, but one which contents itself with one good film where a "factory" would make six bad ones. They were films that could not have been made in America; we know, because America has tried, and with her mechanical methods, failed to make

DREAMS

By ALEC ALEXANDER, JUN.

By a cosy fireside reading the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO, I find myself floating into the unknown.

JANUARY 2, 1932.—After toilet, having a usual run through my daily post from admirers, etc. Ah! L'Agence Artiste.

"Sir,—Kindly call at once, Casting Department re Juvenile Lead, Yours faithfully,

MAX ROMA."

With a nonchalant air, I find myself in an elaborately-furnished waiting room.

Page: "Are you Mr. Alexander, Jr.?"
"I am!"

His buttons seem to brighten everything around as he directs me into Mr. Roma's office.

"Good morning, Mr. Alexander, sorry I kept you waiting a few moments, but

SILLY SONGS ON KINE. SUBJECTS

No. 3—RESTING, ——— by HUGH G. WRIGHT.

*I'm resting.—Just resting!
Doing my Sunday-best in
Looking for jobs from early morn;
Wishing that I had ne'er been born;
Wondering what the Hell to pawn.
Resting!—They call it, Resting.*

I.

I 'VE tramped the streets for a thousand years,
And never a job I've seen.
From Waterloo to the wilds of Kew;
From Croydon to Golders Green.
I've blistered heels, and a brain that reels,
And a waist-belt far too tight.
And I hate the 'buses that thunder by,
For the fare is my dinner to-night.

II.

THEY wanted a character man at Stolls;
But I'm "hardly the type" they guess.
"There's a guinea a day—for a crowd," they say;
But it's got to be evening dress.

And I ate my dress-suit days ago—
It was greedy, of course, I know—
For you aren't allowed—in a well-dressed crowd
With only the ticket to show

III.

FROM Agent's Office to Studio,
I shuffle my aimless way,
It's raining hard, and the Pubs are barred,
For I haven't the price to pay.
The soles of my boots are a sodden pulp,
And my own soul's pulp as well.
For the hopeless trudge, through the slime and sludge,
Is a hell of a walk to Hell.

Doing my Sunday-best in.

extremely skilled labour in all departments, the lavish employment of money in costumes and mountings, have been American monopolies for many years, chiefly because the Americans have had the monopoly of big capital. They undoubtedly resulted in highly finished and, until they were too often repeated, highly pleasing photoplays. But the repetition is now obvious. The public is beginning to ask for something beyond gaudy trappings—and the majority of American directors, who are much more manufacturers than artists, have been singularly unsuccessful in providing it.

One of the results was the sensational summer slump of 1921, which was by no means confined to England. After all allowance is made for specially unfavourable economic and weather conditions, the slump was in chief the public's protest against bad films—and the films were mostly American, made on the time-clock and factory system.

Whatever the faults of British films, they are not, so far as the big majority of directors are concerned, machine-made. The very poverty of most concerns makes mass production impossible. Even if the British director were not convinced of the superiority of a good theme over a series of gorgeous spec-similar films.

That is the most significant thing about 1921 British production activity; that in producing good films it has demonstrated the superiority of the British single-feature method of production over the American wholesale method. With equal financial and technical advantages the superiority will be obvious to all the world—if all British directors are faithful to the principle. One or two of them have been affected by the American example, and in adopting the time-clock method of production have succeeded in acquiring most of the Transatlantic faults without the compensating expertness of the Americans; it is not a coincidence that they have contributed less than their share to the good things of the year.

If the freedom to a good director to work out his theme in his own way and, within reasonable limits, in his own time—the chief cause of the really remarkable British advance of 1921 remains a feature of our native production in 1922—there is no need to fear for the British film. It will not only capture its native market, but hold its own in any part of the world against the subject made to schedule, without either inspiration or enthusiasm.

we should like you to accept a three months' engagement with The British National at £10 a day."

Heavens! It seemed that the costly surroundings were bowing to me as the couch springs lifted me into the air.

"Thanks! I should be pleased to accept, as my last contract expired a few days ago."

"Good! Well, old man, I want you to sign this contract," said he, meanwhile handing me a fine Havana which he took from his desk.

"Thank you, Mr. Alexander, I will 'phone Kingsbury to inform them that you will commence there at 9 a.m. tomorrow. Cheerio. See you at the Kinema Club to-night?"

And the page hands me my hat and stick. I leave the office and enter the lift.

Crash! Crash!
Was it the lift?

No, I awoke finding myself in 1922 making my resolution:—

Work and help my fellow-workers to realise the dream of 1932.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Many very happy returns of the day to Florence Turner, who yesterday celebrated her birthday. Miss Turner has now been officially and legally adopted into British studioland, and we are the richer for her presence among us.

* * *

Here is a true story of an incident that occurred on New Year's Eve. The Pathological Graphic was told by the police that it had better not bring its sunlight arc out to film the New Year celebrations at St. Paul's. Anxious to keep in with the police, the Pathological cameraman decided that as the opposition firm, the Film News Gazette, was bound to send a man up to the celebrations with lights for filming, he would turn up with his camera and steal the picture. Meanwhile, at the offices of the Film News Gazette the cameraman had decided not to trouble taking lights up to St. Paul's as the Pathological people were bound to turn up with theirs. The closing scene of the drama shows two irate cameramen, each seeing the New Year in beside his camera and anxiously waiting for the light that failed.

The Alliance Studio had another large set last week. It represented a big banquet hall, thronged with huntsmen. The artistes on the set were thoroughly enjoying themselves; real food was being provided at the table, and, as a substitute for wine, beer—at least I think it was beer—was being served. Up in a corner of the room a band was playing and things were going along merrily. The set was one of the most gorgeous I have seen, although it was certainly not the largest. Ivor Novello, Henry Vibart and Ellen Terry were playing in the scene. Harley Knoles is responsible for the direction.

Captain Harry Lambart informs me that the first Lambart production, "Romance and Reality," in which Cora Goffin was starred, has been bought by Walter Hast, representing one of the largest distributing companies in America, for £60,000 in advance of fifty-fifty. A selection of stills was despatched to the States a few weeks back, and a cable received by Captain Lambart from Walter Hast informed him that the deal would be closed on the terms stated. A print is now on the way out. It will be remembered that Captain Harry, although an Englishman, spent a number of years in the States directing for Vitagraph and other companies, and his knowledge of the American market has doubtless stood him in good stead.

During the past few days Amy Verity called in to see me and say "Au Revoir" before leaving London last Wednesday for New York. I feel personally interested in Miss Verity's success, for, when I saw her first at the F.P.-Lasky Studios playing the Duchess for Hugh Ford in "The Great Day," I became convinced that she was going to reach stardom quickly—and said so. My predictions came out right—within a year she was starring in "Dead Man's Love." She obtained an excellent Press over her work in "Vi of Smith's Alley," and her last part was in the lead with Maudie Dunham in Ideal's "Sinister Street." Miss Verity has now gone to New York on a six months' contract to play in "Pins and Needles" at Schubert's Theatre on Broadway. But her heart is in the studio, and she is looking forward to resuming work before the camera soon. I hope so, too.

I am wondering whether Wid's Daily (the American film sheet) has a bad proof reader or is merely making a melancholy failure of an attempt at familiarity. It states that "Billy Norwood, who appears as Sherlock Holmes in 'The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes,' which Alexander will handle here, is coming to America."

* * *

This morning I had a chat with Jeffrey

Bernerd, and he informed me that there is to be a slackening down of actual production at the Cricklewood Studios, which will open in full blast in March. There had been some talk of Maurice Elvey making an independent picture on his own, but this has fallen through and he will continue with Stoll. He is now studying the script of and making preparations for his next Stoll production, and Sinclair Hill is doing the same. George Ridgwell is still very busy directing the production of the Sherlock Holmes series, and A. E. Coleby is writing the story for his next Stoll picture. Martin Thornton, I gather, is on the free list and open to direct productions for other organisations.

Congratulations to Max Roma (so well known as an artiste and, later, as manager to the Fryer and Rodger agency) on having received a pleasing Christmas gift from his wife, who has presented Max with a bonnie little son. Thus there are now a trio of small Romas, each of whom, Max swears, has marked histrionic possibilities. Well, we'll "MEGAPHONE," wait and see.

WHO'S WHERE

Several directors have explained to us the difficulty they have of getting quickly into touch with artistes and others whom they need for their productions, and have suggested that we publish addresses and telephone numbers of such. For the benefit of all concerned, therefore, we are commencing a "Who's Where" feature, which will be printed weekly, and will be a list of names, addresses and 'phone numbers,

PRINCIPLES OF PUBLICITY

In at least one respect British artistes (and others) are lagging well behind their American prototype and that is in respect to the art of publicity. In British producing circles there is a lamentable ignorance of this matter: publicity is confused with the science of publicity, and artistes and others have to be educated in this science. At our request Billie Bristow, the successful publicity expert, whose scientific methods have helped to make several artistes popular, contributes a short series of articles on this subject.

I.—ON ADVERTISING.

Not even yet do the majority of people connected with the film industry realise the value of good advertising. And by the majority I do not mean artistes only, but producing, renting and exhibiting concerns.

It seems obvious to me that unless inexperienced advertisers can see direct results, they are dissatisfied—and usually they blame the medium through which they advertise. Does it ever occur to them that even though they may not see any results for some months, they are attracting the attention of potential customers?

Port Sunlight was not built on the results of just one advertising campaign. It took years to impress upon the general public the name of Sunlight—that it was a useful commodity, and housewives should buy this brand of soap.

In reading the morning paper you may glance at an advertisement which by reason of its good "lay-out" and unique setting, tempts you to read it. After reading it you may remember the name of the advertised commodity for twenty-four hours, but after that you forget.

But if on the following morning the same advertisement again appears, almost without reading it at all, you can remember the brand of goods about which you read on the previous day. Find this name brought to your notice for days in succession, and it becomes impressed upon your memory. But the wise advertiser does not trust to your memory alone: you will find the name of that same brand of goods brought to your attention at various intervals not only for weeks but for months to come.

Every advertiser should regard each reader of a paper as a potential purchaser of the goods he has for sale—whether it be in the form of edibles, utility goods, or talents.

Frequently the results of advertising are obtained from very indirect sources, and although not from the actual reader of the advertisement, there is no question that it is through him.

Just one word of warning: Never over-estimate the value of the goods of which you wish to dispose; do not use too many adjectives, and do not exaggerate. If you do it is quite possible that the results of your advertising will be seriously affected. The man who spends is always ready to find fault—though frequently slow to give praise—and if he finds that he has not obtained the value for his money which the advertisement led him to expect, then he will soon make it his business to tell others that he has been "done."

Moreover, if results are not forthcoming even after a long and persistent campaign, it is generally because the goods advertised are at fault and that they do not come up to expectations.

One always has to bear in mind that there are very few things on this earth which, if dispensed with, would be missed for very long, and were they missed, the public has a very short memory, and would rapidly adapt to its general use something else almost as satisfactory.

When advertising, it is always as well to remember that it is essential to advance with the times, that you must adapt your goods to modern requirements—that the maximum demand is for the most up-to-date! This applies, I think, in every case. Competition in every business, profession, and industry is keener to-day than it ever has been—competition is the breath of industry, and it is up to every individual to improve all the time.

Keep on telling your potential clients that you have the goods they require or may require in future; tell them, not once, but all the time that you have those goods for sale, and sooner or later, if you live up to your advertisement, you will reap the reward.

All the foregoing, while being written around commodities, is directly applicable to artistes and others. Artistes have goods to sell: their screen work. They have to sell their screen personality to the kine-going public. And in this respect the methods of advertising are no different from those of Lever Bros. which has to sell its soap to a soap-using public.

BLAMING THE PICTURES

by DIOGENES

You are—at least I hope so—having a Happy New Year. And then this is sprung upon you. Probably your hardship is greater than mine. I have only to write the article. You—God help you!—have to read it.

But I have an awful thought which almost prevents me from going on. You don't have to read it; you can stop here and now if you like. I cannot. So I am more sorry for myself than I am for you.

It is strange to think that if "pictures" had never been invented I should not be writing this and you would not be reading it. This is a far worse thing than any of the magisterial mugwumps have ever blamed on to the pictures. Which reminds me.

There was once a little boy—I have forgotten how old he was—who broke into a bank and stole an overdraft. After a terrific struggle, the overdraft blew him through the roof, where he landed in a passing aeroplane. Dropping the pilot on to a 'bus below, he flew over to Spain and made a corner in the horses killed at bullfights. Twenty years after, now the World's Worst Meat Extract Magnate, he walked slowly down the street of his native village, and paused outside the little old home where he had learned that twice six are eleven. For his mother had sold eggs: three shillings a dozen, straight from the farm—in Holland and soaked in permanganate of potash to give them the lovely brown colour that proves—well, there!

Walking into the kitchen he placed his hand on his father's shoulder. The old man started up with a scream. "I didn't snare them rabbits," he wailed, "they came into the kitchen all by themselves they did, and strangled themselves with my elastic conscience."

The boy—did I mention he was now a man?—smiled through his gold teeth. "Waal, old-timer," he said, "you sure haven't changed any. Nope." Father looked at him. "If it ain't our Bill. What abaht that there jug you broke the day before you went away? 'Ad to drink my beer out o' the kettle ever since."

"Say, dad," said the boy—did I mention he was now a man?—"You're the real cheese, a reg'lar hick from Hicksville."

The old man sighed. "Boy," he said, "I always did tell yer poor old mother that you'd get a nasty accent going so much to them there pictures."

"Bully fer you," replied the boy—did I tell you that he was now a man?—"and mentioning bully reminds me how I made my pile. It was through pictures. Putting pictures of bulls on cans of horse-beef and meat extract."

"Ah," said the old man, with a feeble moan, "now I can depart in peace. For I have at last found out what "bull" means in them sub-titles. It always did puzzle me." So he sat down gently on the copper, and expired.

It is a sad story, and if it has a moral it is that it shows what you can blame on to pictures if you try hard enough.

THE AUTHOR IN THE STUDIO

by RAFAEL SABATINI (the famous Author)

No man of understanding will wish to contradict Sir Oswald Stoll's recent dictum that cinematography is still in its swaddling clothes, and I am bold enough to hope that no man of that kind will contradict me when I say that it will continue in these swaddling clothes until the author—the creator of filmable material—shall have taken his proper place in the studio.

If he has not yet taken that place, if he has evinced an apathy, almost a disdain, in the matter, it is because he has been offered no proper encouragement. How much encouragement he will require is hardly realised.

RAFAEL SABATINI.

A mandarin of cinematography announced to me a year ago that authors would have to make up their minds to write original film scenarios. "It is coming," he prophesied.

Emphatically, it is not coming. In my view it never can come, because an author, although he may not be greatly disturbed about posterity, although he may not aim so high as immortality, does at least expect a measure of permanence for his work; he hopes to command for it some abiding-place—however humble—in the literature of his language, and he depends for his livelihood upon the fruits of cumulative popularity which will maintain the circulation of the books that he may have written throughout his career.

That applies particularly to the novelist. The dramatist is in very similar case. The literature of every language includes a very large number of printed plays, which may still be read even when it is not expedient to perform them.

But the film has none of this permanence, indeed, no sort of permanence at all, to offer. In its presentation it is disconcertingly ephemeral, and a film scenario is not a form of literature in which the most unsophisticated could take satisfaction. It is because of this that I cannot conceive the serious author addressing himself to the writing of original film scenarios.

But I can certainly conceive his adapting to the film such works of his as may have secured performance in another medium. To the artiste and the public alike, it is of advantage to present a subject in as many media as lie open to its expression.

The dramatisation of novels suitable for the stage is a commonplace; and the conversion of successful plays into novels—whilst rarely more than meretricious—is also a commonplace. The film, standing midway between the novel and the play, finds in both many subjects suitable to itself. The translation of a story from one medium to the other is, in itself, interesting and engaging work; the rewards are considerable. Here, then, are two of the three inducements which I consider necessary to stir the author out of his apathy.

The third, however—and the principal one—still remains absent. Before any established and self-respecting author will consent to write for the screen he must not only be made as free of the studio as the dramatist is free of the theatre, but he must enjoy there the same authority which the dramatist enjoys in the theatre. He must be assured that what he writes for the screen shall go upon the screen, and not what someone else thinks he should have written, not someone else's garbled interpretation of what he actually has written, or someone else's improvisations upon themes which he has laboured to perfect.

To ensure and accomplish this state of things it is necessary that the script of a film should be as full and complete as the script of a play. It must lay out the essentials of every scene-plot; it must prescribe every movement, every gesture, every expression and every look of the actors; it must define the range of every camera-shot in all the intervening stages between Full Scene and Close Up; where necessary it must indicate the particularities of the lighting; and, if possible—with a view to preserving correct proportion, so that each part may bear a proper relationship to the whole—it should indicate the speed at which each scene should be taken.

That, in brief—very much in brief—is the ideal script. It is, as will be seen, not a film scenario at all, but a Screen Play. Obviously this screen play will never be the work of a professional scen-arist, but can proceed only from the mind and pen of the author himself.

I may provoke by this the hostility of a certain class of director. But the director who resents the advent and authority of the author will best serve cinematography by turning his attention to some other industry.

The theatre abounds in clever producers who, through long years of labour and experience, have mastered the intricacies of a technique extraordinarily difficult and exacting, because extraordinarily subtle. These men do not regard it as beneath their dignity to procure from all concerned a close and faithful rendering of the work of the youngest author whose play has been acquired for production.

So, too, in kinema studios, I am persuaded, will the really talented and serious directors not only view without dismay the arrival of the screen play (as I define it) but they will cordially welcome it, and faithfully carry out its prescriptions.

I must not be understood from all this to imply that every author—every novelist, or every dramatist—is, by the mere fact of his authorship, qualified to write screen plays. There are many gifted novelists who can never begin to master the technique of the stage, and there are many famous dramatists who have made a sad mess of things in attempting to write novels. But many authors in either medium have succeeded in the other.

Thus, too, with the writing of screen plays. Many authors skilled in other media of expression will break down in this; but many more will succeed; and if cinematography is to come out of swaddling clothes and grow and develop, those who govern it will offer to such authors as these the last essential inducement.

Creative art resides mainly in two things: ideas, and the manner of expressing those ideas, which is commonly called technique. Technique is peculiar to the artist: it is evolved by him instinctively to meet his needs; it is his style; it is himself; and in no two artists is it the same.

In craftsmen, technique—the technique of the performer or interpreter, as distinct from the technique of the creator—being acquired, is always similar. It does not evolve.

As long as cinematography remains the expression by craftsmen of the ideas of artistes, so long will it have no technique but the technique of craftsmen, and, therefore, so long will it refrain from evolving at any considerable rate. It is by the evolution of the artiste's technique that the limitations of an art's expression are widened. And the technique of an art can be evolved only by the artiste himself.

YOUR CORNER

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

"THE CAP THAT DOES NOT FIT."

May one presume to enquire why Sidney Jay declines to engage any pupil of a kinema school?

Is this a reflection on every such school, or is it that the material they have to work on is always so inferior that the reputation of the agent would suffer by providing them with a shop?

One cannot drive an automobile or ride a horse without being taught, and I seem to have heard of dramatic schools and dancing academies. Then why not a kinema school?

When one reads so contemptuous a refutation of connection with any kinema school, or the graduates therefrom, over the name of so eminent an agent, one is given furiously to think.

I know of a school in London which turns out a satisfactory percentage of actors from its pupils. Many of them, who are with film companies of note, have a very great affection for the old studio and the men therein who knocked them into shape. They never pass without calling in to acknowledge that their present success is due principally to the tuition received there, and are proud and pleased to be of any assistance, by passing on their aid and knowledge to present pupils.

Evidently there is no more talent to be discovered, or perhaps the English film companies can afford to ignore the possibility of there still being any in the country if an agent who provides them with their players chooses to leave any source unexplored—A. E. V. (Capt.).

"NINETEEN-THIRTY-TWO."

Doubtless many members of the profession after reading Gerald McKie's visionary article in the issue of December 31 will soliloquise "If only such could come to pass."

It will come to pass if—the only if—we attain that complete harmony and co-operation which make for success everywhere.

I do not attempt to criticise past or present methods in the profession; I am merely one among many who would like to see British films at the top of the ladder. Who wouldn't like to see at least 50 per cent. of our films on the market?

So let us put our backs and hearts into it, and devote 1922 to mass progress, and individual progress is bound to keep in step.—"SMALL VOICE."

MAKING A SCENARIST.

A writer in the Daily Express rushes into print over the prospect of aspirants as scenarists. He points out that during the present slump in the film world not many British producers are encouraging women to become scenario writers, but those who believe in the future of the film and who realise its immense possibilities declare that there is need for of more them. Kinema audiences are 75 per cent. women and children, yet the situations in the average photo-play appeal chiefly to men, and there is often a false note concerning the woman's attitude to life.

The work of a scenario writer is not necessarily to originate the plot, but to adapt it for the film by writing the "continuity," page by page, scene by scene, with the thousand and one technical directions that only inside experience of the studio can give. The scenario of a photo-play that takes an hour or so might consist of 200 typed pages, therefore it will be seen that the continuity cannot be written in a day. In England the price paid for a scenario would start at £10 10s., £100

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

Hugh E. Wright, in addition to his recognised histrionic ability, is a skilled wielder of the pen. By the courtesy of the Actor we are able to reproduce, in serial form, one of Hugh's literary effusions.

CHAPTER IV.—THE MAD LUNCHEON PARTY.

THE place they reached was a large room, in the centre of which was a large table, at which twenty or thirty people were sitting eating. To Alice it seemed as if they were all eating and all talking at the same time. "And if they are," she thought, "they can't really be grown-ups, because grown-ups never talk with their mouths full; so after all it is only a dream!"

They looked up as the two came into the room, and the Director said in a loud voice: "Say, boys and girls —"

"That proves they're not grown-ups," thought Alice. "But they're certainly not boys and girls. There's a man there who looks ninety at least. Second childhood, perhaps."

She pulled the Director's coat sleeve. "Who are they all?" she interrupted him.

"Just actors," said the Director. "Why?"

"I could see there was something the matter with them," explained Alice, "but I couldn't think what!"

The Director looked at her severely. "Boys and girls," he began again, "let me introduce you to a new recruit to Filmland. This is Alice!"

The Star, who was sitting with the others at the table, rose immediately and, raising his glass in a magnificent gesture, said: "Ladies and gentlemen, a toast! To Alice!"

They all raised their glasses and drained them enthusiastically. In fact, one man—a funny, round, little thing with a solemn face—was so enthusiastic he raised somebody else's glass, and had half drained it before it was snatched away from him.

"He's drinking my beer!" said an indignant voice.

"Never mind," said the Star, soothingly. "It's only Fred. He never knows the difference between 'meum' and 'tuum.'"

"Meum and tuum," said the little round man. "Never 'eard of 'em. Barrasford, I suppose; they never did the Stoll tour, anyhow."

There was a general burst of laughter, though one or two came in a little late, Alice thought.

"Meum and tuum," said the Star scornfully, "happens to be a quotation from the Greek. If you'd been to Cambridge you'd know."

"Ah!" said the little round man. "I ain't like you, yer see, I've always done the number one towns. Come and sit down, my dear," he added to Alice kindly, indicating an empty chair by his side.

Alice thanked him and sat down.

"Beef, mutton, chicken, or saveloy?" said the little man.

"Chicken, thank you," said Alice.

"Don't thank me," he answered. "Guess again!"

"I didn't know it was a riddle," said Alice.

"It isn't," he replied. "But there isn't any chicken."

"Then I think it's rather silly of you to offer it me," said Alice.

"Not silly," he protested. "Funny! I'm a comedian. Have some beer!"

"No, thank you," said Alice.

Apparently the little man didn't hear her, for a glass of beer was put by her plate. "I don't drink beer," explained Alice gently.

"It isn't the thing to dip your bread in it," said the comedian.

"I mean I don't like beer," said Alice.

"I'll drink it for you," he answered kindly, and suited the action to the word. "Have some more!" he suggested, wiping his mouth.

"I haven't had any yet. I don't like it."

"Better have another glass," he persisted. "It will look bad if they think you've finished this one so quickly."

"If you don't mind drinking it for me?" hesitated Alice.

"Well, it's not the thing I'd do for everybody," he replied. "But seeing it's you —" And another glass of beer appeared and disappeared like lightning.

Meanwhile, the Star was arguing with another man across the table. "You cut me to pieces in that last bit!" Alice heard him say.

"I like that," was the answer. "I was trying all I knew to get your eye, and I didn't once!"

Alice looked at the Star carefully, but she couldn't see a join anywhere. At last she couldn't restrain her curiosity any longer.

"Please, would you tell me who put you together again?" she asked him politely.

"Put me together again!" spluttered the Star.

"After you were cut to pieces," Alice explained. "You're so beautifully stuck up."

There was a general chorus of "So he is, so he is!" and the Star spluttered more than ever, and eventually got up and went out amid a roar of laughter. Alice was quite bewildered; she couldn't understand what had happened.

"Did I say anything wrong?" she asked the little man in a whisper.

"No; perfectly right—perfectly right!" chuckled the little man. "A Star always is stuck up. They can't help it. And after that," he added to the company in general, "I votes she sings us something."

"But I can't sing," protested Alice.

"Well, recite then," he amended.

"I don't think I know anything," she faltered.

"Surely you can recite 'The Jabberwock,'" somebody suggested, and there was a chorus of "Jabberwock, Jabberwock!"

Alice thought she really could remember that, so she stood up and started. Somehow it felt wrong at the very beginning, but she couldn't stop in the middle, could she, so she just shut her eyes and stuck to it.

This was how it sounded:—

STUDIO LESSONS

Writing in The Amateur Photographer E. Lauste, the cameraman, points out the advantages that still photographers will possess, if only they would patronise the picture-houses a little more.

With their elaborate lighting systems and the material at their disposal, kine. cameramen have the means of turning out far better work than the ordinary still photographer. Any photographer could hardly see a good film from beginning to end without receiving some suggestions which, applied to his own work, might bring forth good fruit. Those who pursue their work in the neighbourhood of kinematograph studios are often privileged to avail themselves of the settings which are to be found there; and many of our readers will recall pictures, in this year's Salon in particular, in which it was quite evident that the photographer had not only gone to the studio for his inspiration, but also for the material from which he built up his picture. Help of this kind is limited to the fortunate few, but that the keen picture-maker can profit by his visits to the pictures we have no doubt.

Not only still photographers can benefit by paying periodical visits to the kinemas, but even movie cameramen can pick up a great many hints by becoming regular patrons of the picture theatre. A great many cameramen who do not regard themselves as being too expert to learn more are regular patrons of various picture houses. The result is seen in their work, for by picking up hints on effects and lighting, they get some really fine results into their own pictures.

It may be something in the nature of a 'busman's holiday to cameramen to spend a number of evenings every week in a kinema, but those who do it find it a very interesting way of spending their time and an interesting way of learning, also.

Two well-known men spend so many evenings a week together in a kinema, going there for the express purpose of getting ideas and finding out mistakes, and together they discuss the effects and the camerawork, with excellent results to their own photography.

being the top figure. In American £100 would be a very low figure. In England the initial salary of a woman scenario writer would be only £4 a week; in America women like Eve Unsell, Frances Marion, and Margaret Turnbull make thousands.

In America, university training in scenario writing is available; in England only correspondence courses and text-books. A girl could study these and train herself by regular visits to the kinema, but without inside studio experience few directors would employ her. In the opinion of a British woman film expert, she would do best by getting a post as clerk or short-hand-typist in a director's office, and by rising to the post of assistant director (£4 or £5 a week) she would, by much handling of scenarios, be able to observe their defects and write them herself. Famous authors often enter the studio to gain the technique for adapting their work themselves, as they complain that the scenario writer often fails to preserve its spirit.

ON WRITING SCENARIOS

IV.—The Function of the Sub-Title.

by GERTRUDE M. ALLEN

Advanced souls in the film-world have long been debating the possibility of evolving a thoroughly intelligible and perfect film—without titles; that is, without the letterpress that appears so often as a prelude to a scene. Maybe their experiments, based on a complete knowledge of the art of picture-making, will eventually result in the picture without titles; but I, for one, sincerely hope not.

Let them eliminate, by all means, the travesties of the English language which are allowed to thrive like weeds in a neglected garden—let them take those ruthless film scissors on a mission of destruction into the crude, ungrammatical regions of the sub-title which irritates and functions not.

But the good sub-title, in its rightful place, is one of the film's greatest artistic assets. If its use is abolished then the picture-play will be incomplete—like a wonderful box of bonbons without a wonderful ribbon-bow, or a statuesque vase robbed of the flowers that were meant to find rest there.

And for the moment, at any rate, the title-less picture play remains in a state of potential existence, and the scenario writer can count on the sub-title as one of the strongest branches of the art which he must study minutely before he can evolve the complete scenario.

Even brain-children live normal existences sometimes, and the author will repeatedly find it necessary to take his characters over a lapse of time between one incident and another. But there is a prosaic way of doing it—and an unusual way of doing it. The prosaic author would say: "A Month Later," and the unusual author would say, "With the passing of a month." And "the little more, and how much it is!"

I recently saw a film which would have been a masterpiece had not the sub-titles dragged it just outside the circle of perfection. It was a tender, romantic story—the sort of tale that gets into the hearts of a tired community and leaves a glimmer of light on a dark horizon. It was perfectly acted, perfectly produced, and perfectly written, but the sub-titles were bad because they were ordinary. One scene depicted the influence of a mother upon her children, and the title that preceded it read like this:—

"Upon the mother's return much of the unrest is dispelled."

What a world of latent expression lies behind those cold, blatant words! What an opportunity for the pen of the thinker!

The scene that followed the curtly informative title was robbed of its true charm because there had been no charm in the title. Picture the difference in the atmosphere of the scene, had we been enlightened something like this:—

"The light of a Mother-love shone over the dark spaces, and there was peace in a little kingdom."

The sub-title is not a necessary evil. It is pregnant with possibilities—it is the chalice of expression from which the screen author should drink deep and long.

Do not use a sub-title when it is not necessary; but when necessity demands it, use it with that knowledge of its infinite and far-reaching power of poetic expression—that power which still makes the sub-title one of the most potent factors of a film's success.

Next Week: Writing for an Individual Artiste.

A NEW TRIPOD

The Mitchell Company is introducing a new tripod into the American studios, says the Motion Picture News. The shoes are of cast aluminium, with points of hardened steel screwed in and locked with nuts. Inside the shoe and at an angle of forty-five degrees is a second point, which will catch in case the tripod leg slips, thus preventing a bad accident. The legs are of maple, reinforced with metal at the top, and a steel plate on either side of the wood.

A third set in the leg has a forty-five degree taper pressed in the end which fits in a recess machined in the base. This recess has a hole in the centre, and a bolt passes through this, through the base, and into the other section of the leg. A lock nut maintains a constant tension at all times. In reality the legs are on taper bearings, and tightening the nut draws the bearing central as well as tightens it. A quick release is provided so the camera may be turned quickly. This release has a left-hand thread, which tightens when you unscrew the tripod head and loosens should any one tighten the head too tight.

A double-quick operating clamp is mounted between the legs, right and left-hand screws actuated by large aluminium knobs tighten the clamps on each leg. A compensator in the clamp assures that both clamps will operate evenly no matter what the irregularity of the legs. This clamp is operated with one hand and a half turn is sufficient to release or clamp the leg.

A standard Kuffel and Esser instrument thread is provided on which to screw the tripod head. The tripod head is made of aluminium alloy and is adjustable throughout. It does not depend on the fit of the worm and worm wheel for steadiness, but has two discs in bearings which are pressed together with spiral springs. This gives steadiness directly in the bearings.

The panorama device is of a distinct type. The worm wheel with bronze bushing in the centre fits on a hardened steel spindle threaded at its lower end. Two lock washers fit on to this by which the wear in the bearing may be adjusted. The worm wheel has no bearing on its periphery so a dent will not interfere with the working of the panorama.

The weight of the camera is carried on the top outer edge of the worm wheel which rests on a ring of like diameter cast in the tripod base, thereby affording added rigidity. The worm may also be brought into closer mesh with the worm wheel by removing a sheet of Laminum which is two-thousandths of an inch in thickness.

KINEMA CLUB NEWS

With the existing adverse circumstances in the studios it has been deemed wiser to make the Opening Ceremony of such a character that the cost to individual members shall be reduced to the minimum. To this end the Executive Committee has decided to dispense with an expensive Members' Dinner and to celebrate the opening in a less pretentious, if more Bohemian manner.

The plan is for the Opening Ceremony to be performed on Sunday, January 22, at 6.30 p.m., by a well-known gentleman in the profession. This will be followed by a Musical Program, an Informal Dance and a Social Evening. The cost is being kept down very low and members will be allowed to bring a friend on this occasion. Complimentary speeches will be given by certain leading people in the profession, and a highly successful function should result.

Membership is now in the region of 350, including most of the leading directors, artistes, cameramen and others engaged in the profession. The opportunity for application as Founder Members closed on Thursday last and all subsequent applicants will have to pay a yearly subscription of five guineas; Life Membership, twenty-five guineas.

We are asked to request all members to send to the Hon. Secretary their private address and telephone number in order to complete their registration as members.

Further, all members who have not yet paid their subscription are urged to send same at once to the Hon. Secretary at 93, Long Acre, W.C.2—cheques to be made payable to "The Kinema Club." This is of great importance, as the initial expenses of opening the Club are very high. Founder members can become life members—free of all further payments—by paying twenty guineas.

Gifts in money or kind to the Club will be greatly appreciated. Various gifts have already been received and offers of others should be sent to the Secretary. Pictures are particularly welcome and also any article of furniture which will tend to make the Club more comfortable.

Those desirous of being present at the Opening Ceremony are asked to notify the Secretary of their intention on the form on this page.

CAMERAMEN AT WORK

The wholesale closing down of film companies for the holidays has come as a severe blow to cameramen. A large number of really good men are out of work, while many of those in jobs are hardly suited to turn a camera crank. It is amazing to me some of the men who manage to get jobs behind the camera. To my knowledge there are at least half a dozen really expert men out of work at the present minute, while crowds of unknown amateurs seem to be able to fix up jobs and greatly assist in spoiling the products of British film producing companies.

* * *

Why is it that companies engaging cameramen take little trouble in finding out whether or not their prospective employees can take pictures? Previously, anybody who could cultivate an American accent could get a job as a director. That day is past now; film companies are going more warily—they have had some. And yet they will still engage a cameraman who is incompetent. We have now recognised that bad photography can spoil a picture. And yet gaze around at certain photographers now on the job—it is truly amazing!

"Potted Sunlight" is the new light by which the Topical Budget is filming by night. The Topical people do not claim that they have made a world-shattering discovery; in fact, they are keeping quite quiet about it all. Neither do they claim that by using "Potted Sunlight" they can obtain first-class studio photographs—they can't; at least, not yet. Experiments are going on which will give better results than those at present obtained, but what the Topical cameramen do claim is that they can film any event now the "Potted Sunlight" is carried in a small portmanteau, so that be it on the hill-tops or in the most inaccessible spots, it is possible to get a moving picture of the event.

Last week, in another section of the paper, we published an article on close-ups. The writer talks about seeing how hideous a painting is at close quarters and then seeing how beautiful it looks at a distance. While not wishing to make any statement as to whether I think the close-up is necessary or not, I would like to point out that the portrait idea is the wrong simile to use. I have seen many very beautiful close-ups and many bad ones as well, but a good cameraman can get some beautiful pictures in the close-up, whereas, if you view any painting at close quarters, it looks absolute rubbish.

* * *

I notice in an American Trade paper an argument about Charles Rosher's work in "Little Lord Fauntleroy." This picture contains a host of trick shots, which have come in for a great deal of comment on the other side. It makes me interested to see the Trade show of the film in England.

I desire to be present at the Opening Ceremony of the Kinema Club on Sunday, January 22, and wish to bringfriends.

"A QUESTION OF CLOSE-UPS"

In the last issue of the STUDIO the question of the wisdom of close-ups was raised, and we asked: "In the art of the screen are close-ups necessary? Are they dramatically wrong in principle? If so, why? And why are they often badly photographed; usually over-exposed?"

Below we give the replies of Walter Reynolds, Junr., and "Felis," the Kinema Correspondent of the Soho Gazette.

BY WALTER REYNOLDS, JUNR.

The answer to the question—"Are close-ups necessary?"—is, in my humble opinion, most emphatically "Yes." The probing test of technical analysis proves that the close-up is the most effective method of getting over tense emotion that has yet been discovered. To support this contention I need only quote the Court scene in "Madame X." Those who have had the advantage of seeing it will doubtless admit that this scene is the most dramatic and emotional piece of acting ever filmed, and that it proves the power of the film to rise to heights that cannot be surpassed in the spoken drama. Without the many close-ups in this scene the climax would have lost a great deal of its force. By what other means could one so effectively have conveyed the emotions of the mother, the son, and the father?

It is, I imagine, because the close-up is so useful that it is so much misused. American directors have most wantonly abused the use of the close-up. Many examples exist where action is delayed, to such an extent that the story becomes slow and uninteresting, in order that the principals may monopolise the footage and be kept constantly in the picture.

There are, no doubt, cases where the director has no option, and where the scenarist has about as much voice in the matter as the office boy, but there are, on the other hand, many occasions where the director loses his sense of proportion in regard to dramatic values and deliberately inserts a close-up where it is nothing less than an intrusion.

There is a decided tendency on the part of American directors to indulge in "the sincerest form of flattery," and where they lack that original imagination which enables the leading men of the profession to create new methods and ideas they fall back on imitation. Unfortunately, these brethren of the mechanical mind think it great wisdom to out-Herod Herod, hoping thereby to outshine his effulgent notoriety, therefore they follow in the footsteps of Mr. Big-Noise by putting in two close-ups to every one of his.

The greatest abuse of all is the close-up with the distorted focus. This idea has now become so commonplace as to be a positive nuisance, and it is only on very rare occasions that its use can be justified as an artistic necessity. This hazy definition, inserted at an unwarranted opportunity, only creates, in the lay mind, the impression of careless photography, and any extraneous thought, such as this, reacts by breaking the thread of the narrative.

It is a pity that so many people who are engaged in the making of motion pictures should lose sight of the fact that, when shorn of all its tricks and embroideries, our film is merely a story. The plot is like a railway track that takes the passenger by a direct route, if embellishments such as close-ups or long shots of spectacular grandeur are met with on the direct route the journey becomes more enjoyable, but they seldom warrant a deviation from the direct route.

It requires an artistic sense to decide when and where a close-up is dramatically helpful, and, unfortunately, all directors are not artists; some of them appear to go about their work as if they were animal trainers putting their performers through oft-repeated tricks, and one can almost see the poor actors, metaphorically, jumping through hoops and walking on their hind legs.

To return to the writer in the Toronto Mail, it is pleasing to learn that he finds an absence of this abuse in British films; he has noticed the use of the semi-close-up, and I think, with him, that it is better, in the majority of cases, to use this kind of shot and keep the story moving.

BY "FELIS" (SOHO GAZETTE).

As close-ups have always been my pet aversion on the screen, I was very pleased to read the article in the STUDIO. However, the writer in question deals only with one aspect—the ugliness of close-ups. My chief objection to them is that they interrupt the continuity of the action, and so mar the dramatic effect of the incidents into which they are introduced.

Here, to prevent confusion, I must define my present meaning in the use of the word "close-up" (a word which has no definite meaning), as being a scene in which one character is shown separately while other characters are known by the spectator to be taking part in the action.

It is in the scenes of the climax that this cutting apart of the different characters has a specially bad effect on the dramatic grip of the action. It is the essence of a climax that all threads of interest in the story should meet in it, so that, to concentrate first on one character and then on another, really prevents the scenes from constituting a true climax.

When I have spoken to directors about the evils of the close-up (in the sense defined) they have contended that it serves definite story-telling purposes. In the "exposition," or scenes introducing the characters, they say that a close-up of each character is necessary in order to impress its distinguishing points on the mind of the spectator.

Then, in the case of dialogue, it is contended that the close-up denotes which character is speaking. For instance, if a sub-title appears "The child is my own," it makes a lot of difference whether it is Edwin or Angelina who makes the remark.

Well, I grant that close-ups are useful in the exposition, and there is no reason why they should not always be retained simply to introduce the characters separately. But I hope and believe that close-ups (in the sense defined) will gradually drop out of every other part of the photoplay.

For the purpose of distinguishing who is meant to be speaking the words of a sub-title, some gesture or action is generally sufficient. If it should not be so, then the sub-title could read as in printed dialogue, thus:—

EDWIN (or ANGELINA, as the case may be): "The child is my own."

It is not in the close-up, but in the long-shot, that the screen has an artistic advantage over the stage. Character and feeling can often be quite as finely expressed by action and attitude as by facial expression. For instance, no more dramatic denouement has ever been invented than the final scene of "The Tramp," a back view of Charlie Chaplin as he wanders off on his lonely way.

But then, of course, Charlie can express more with his feet than many artistes can with their faces.

BY FRANK CANHAM

Close-ups are, I think, necessary to enable facial expressions to get over to the audience in essential situations, where no acting on the part of the artiste would convey to the same extent, if done in a "mid view" shot.

Close-ups are no doubt introduced far too frequently and often without any real dramatic effect, but if used at the right moment nothing is more telling. Frequently they are too big, and nothing is more inartistic than when the texture of the skin and every imperfection is brought out and exaggerated. Neither a picture nor a photograph should be viewed from too close a point.

Too often through faulty printing you get "empty" faces on the screen, and the poor cameraman gets all the blame for a badly lit and wrongly exposed close-up, although the negative may be perfect.

If, in coming in from a long or mid view shot (naturally taken on critical focus), you introduce a decidedly diffused close-up, the audience instinctively feels that something is different, and it is this combining of "hard" and "soft" focus photography that is wrong dramatically.

Semi-close-ups are possibly the most valuable of any shot—it gives to the artiste or artistes more room for action, and they are not so cramped, especially when wanting to use their hands and arms. How often in a close-up they are expected to convey something "broad," and in the rehearsal they are unable to keep within their "limits," and in consequence they have to do all their actions in a cramped and unnatural manner. I am certain the players have too often experienced this.

FOURPENCE

A BRITISH DIRECTOR OF BIG SUCCESSES.

GEOFFREY H. MALINS, O.B.E. has achieved a series of big successes in his recent productions for the Hardy Film Co., Ltd., which were produced under his Sole Direction from the stories and scenarios of Rafael Sabatini.

The first of the series, "BLUFF," completed last year, was acclaimed by the critics as the finest British picture of 1921, and was at once acquired by the Gaumont Co.

The second, "THE RECOIL," is to be distributed in U.K. by The Stoll Film Co.

The third, "THE SCOURGE," a Super-Production, will be trade shown very shortly.

The fourth, "THE REAPING," is now in hand.

The fifth, "THE LION'S SKIN," and

The sixth, "BARDELYS THE MAGNIFICENT," are now in the scenario stage.

His production "WATCHING EYES," which won such high praise from the critics last summer, is now being shown throughout the United States by the Arrow Film Corporation, New York, and proclaimed as the "Sensation of the Season."

Making It Live.

AN informal discussion between the Editor and a group of regular picture patrons this week brought to light several interesting points. One of the most interesting of these was a growing preference for British films on account of their reality and sincerity as compared with the stock American screen subjects. And while comparisons are odious, it has to be admitted that a pursuance of this line of discussion revealed that on this particular point—that of sincerity of story, acting and production—the “fans” placed the Swedish films first and British second. It was found that the seriousness of the Swedish pictures—which was considered by some of the fans to be almost morbid—is against them, but this was outweighed by the artistry and sincerity. The continual return to and insistence on the point of sincerity was very striking, especially in view of the fact that a theory has been put forward that the technical (in every sense) excellence of the American film compensates for any story defects it may have. To find, however, that a casual group of typical picturegoers pay little regard to the technical points in their final judgment on a film, but are chiefly concerned that it should “ring true” both in story, acting and production, gives to British Directors a strong lead on the first essentials of their work. That these essentials are already there in embryo is certain. And that they can be developed to the benefit of the British film is equally certain if our Directors—and their executive controllers!—will follow the lead which the picturegoers have given.

A Dying Policy.

RECENTLY Stewart Rome wrote in this journal an article at the conclusion of which he advocated the writing of special scenarios from which films would be made as vehicles for one particular star to display his histrionic abilities. There is, to our mind, a flavour of bygone days about this suggestion. We cannot fail to recognise that the British motion picture industry must pass through exactly the same progressive phases as the Americans have done already; and the Americans are busy jettisoning much of the cargo of the Good Ship “Films.” Included in this clearance is the “Star uber alles” idea.

* * *

O, Worship the Star!

WHILE it is perfectly true that there has been in the past a foolish tendency on the part of the public to hitch its worship-wagon to a star, the star has been, first, last and all the time, the end-all and be-all of the production. In the studio, as in the kinema theatre, everyone heroine-worship. Perhaps the reason for this is that the kine-going public has become much more critical and exacting. The past triumphs of stars cut no ice if the present work is mediocre. There is in this fact an inference that the day of the satellites of the studio is coming: the public is quite prepared to place on its pedestal of popularity the lesser-known artistes, providing they can deliver the goods. That is the acid test.

Single-Star Pictures.

ANOTHER tendency that we can anticipate is for photoplays to have more than two stars. The single-star tradition is dying—dying because its inherent weakness has revealed itself. The stars who, irrespective of cast and story, can hold our interest for a whole film and persuade belief in the characters they play can be counted on one hand, and it is a fact not yet sufficiently realised that a mediocre cast does not show up, but detracts from, the achievement of the leading actor, by providing easy loopholes for credulity and interest to escape. This being so, it is immediately apparent that what will become the policy is the use of

- ¶ Why do you work?
Is it just for a living?
Or because you love your art?
Or both?
- ¶ If it is only for what you get out of it
That is what you should do:
Get out of it!
- ¶ Because there is no place any more
For people who do not believe in their work
When they are making photoplays
That are meant to be something better
Than so many feet of photographs
By which to administer mental anaesthetics has fallen down in senselessly abject worship of H.M. the Star. And the indirect result has been a reduction in the quality of all other sections of the production. This is still somewhat the case in certain British productions; but is gradually dying out in the American studios. What is of far more importance than the star is the story; and if, as Stewart Rome suggests, stories should be written for stars, then we are forced to anticipate a lamentable limitation in both quality and appeal of film stories. This policy of writing for the star is absolutely wrong in principle.
To fools.

* * *

The Acid Test.

AS a matter of fact the popularity of stars is decreasing among the kine-going public. There is not now—even among the flapper fraternity—the sticky, sickly, sugary, sentimental hero- and casts of all-good artistes. This does not mean the old-style “All-Star Casts,” which was a misnomer, but the casting for all parts of good grade artistes each capable of really making a perfect-fitting feature of their part.

The Club Opening.

LET us take this opportunity to refer to our next issue, which will be an enlarged “Club Souvenir Number” to mark the opening of the Kinema Club. It will be in coloured covers, and, in addition to the usual features, will contain special messages from leading members of the profession, photographs of the Club itself and of some of the members of the Committees, and specially contributed Club articles and interviews. We have also arranged for the full list of members’ names to be printed in this issue.

ON CUTTING AND ASSEMBLING

The editing and assembling, commonly called and known the "putting together," of a picture after all the scenes have been shot, is as important a subject to discuss or write about as possibly any other branch of the Industry, and is more or less responsible for the success or failure of many a picture which otherwise might have been either the former or the latter.

Most emphatically do I state that every director should assemble his own picture. The continuity of a scenario, (even supposing perfection) does not go to prove that anyone else, however experienced or competent, can assemble the picture—merely following the script—as well as the director can himself, because no one knows, or should know, better what desired effect he wishes to obtain and the best method of dividing or splitting up his scenes with an occasional "cut back" to accomplish the final and best results.

As every director has a different method, I can merely, after many years' experience, but quote my own, which is this:

After the taking of my picture is finally completed, and the negative proves good, it is looked over and supervised by my cameraman, and a positive print is made of the same. I then look at every foot of it on the screen.

I usually leave it to my cameraman not to have printed such negative as we both know is useless through some unavoidable circumstances, as perhaps running short of footage while taking a scene, or negative with a lot of static or bad stock, or scenes which had to be taken over again for some unforeseen reason, such as clouds passing over the sun during a most important dramatic situation, or a light (if in dark studio) going out in the midst of a scene, especially if a spot light is being used.

These are details which in any studio or exterior work are not possible to avoid, and my cameraman knows that as well as I do. All retakes, however (excepting from above reasons), if taken once, twice, or three times, I personally see on the screen, and the reason is that often what a director and cameraman consider should be the best retake might in some small way prove the worst when seen on the screen, or a portion of it might be excellent and the other portion not as good as the other retake.

Therefore the director can often take the best part from one retake and by a short "cut back" of some other scene (put between) follow with the best part of a second or third retake, and thus make that principal scene as a whole perfect. I personally have several times done this.

After looking at all my print (a good deal of it being seen as the picture is being directed) when completed, I assemble my positive according to continuity, but cut very little in this first or

WITH a lengthy experience of the production methods of both British and American studios Norman Macdonald can be regarded as an authority on the subject of editing a film. In this specially-contributed article he explains his own methods and deals with the question of assembling a negative in a very informative manner.

NORMAN MACDONALD

rough assemble, and then again see it run on the screen.

After looking at it this time a director can see which scenes or retakes are to be retained and which are to be practically eliminated or discarded.

Now we go to a most important part of the assembling or editing of the production, and that is the titles and sub-titles. These should be carefully gone over with the scenario editor, or whoever is engaged upon this special line of work, and it is a most important position.

Deviating for a moment, I might mention that a large portion of the success of D. W. Griffith's pictures (not mentioning the exceptional atmosphere and mountings which he usually obtains) is due to the fact of his titles and sub-titles. Seldom do you read a title in a Griffith production that is not most pertinent to the scene preceding, taking place, or about to follow.

Knowing Mr. Griffith ever since his early days at the Biograph, I have rather studied and admired his method in this respect. As a rule, in his now big productions (and even in his earlier days) you will find that he starts with hundreds of feet of title before you actually see one foot of the actual picture, and yet if closely and analytically studied I doubt whether you could suggest an elimination of one single word. His titles usually suggest either some powerful or poetic meaning, or some crashing statement of facts, leading up to his story; in other words, they make you think.

I am not for a moment suggesting that such a kind of titling would be appropriate for many productions, any more than many productions are Griffithisms; I simply wish to point out the fact that the extraordinary care and thought that must be given to the titling and sub-titling of his productions might well be given to great advantage to any production. Unfortunately, this seems to be the last thing thought of in the final assembling of a picture. Too often you will hear such a remark as: "Oh, we can cut that and cover it up with a sub-title. Any old sub-title will do as long as it fills up the gap."

What a grave mistake! And yet I will confess that I have sometimes myself made that grave mistake as most directors have.

And these titles and sub-titles all come under the supervision of the director, as he alone knows the action that he has taken during the making of his picture and thus what sort of a sub-title is best suited for his action.

This important matter being satisfactorily arranged, I then begin to cut my picture, placing my sub-titles in rotation in their respective places, being very careful in the speaking titles, as nothing is really more tiresome than to see a spoken title flashed on the screen and coming back to the character see him or her start to speak this title after several feet of film have been run or vice-versa.

In cutting my positive, I do not throw away one single foot of my cuts until the final showing of same, as at the last moment it might come in useful.

Having completed placing my titles in their proper places with my "flash-backs," the picture is measured and again run. It is now that the director can see just how much footage must be cut out. Notes are made just where and what to cut and whatever titles can be eliminated, where the action is so apparent that they become unnecessary or superfluous, etc.

These notes being made and a copy given to me, it now becomes merely the work of a mechanical cutting-room man or woman of experience—most of them have become very adept. The picture completed so far, is then seen for its final time for any especial tinting and "snipping."

After this the director, cameraman, and all those concerned in the many difficulties of assembling and editing the picture give a sigh of relief and no doubt mutter Deo gratias!

Intimate Studio Gossip

During the making of scenes in her new film in which she appears as a little slum child, Flora le Breton received a severely scalded leg. Her (film) father was supposed to throw a kettle of water on to the floor—the kettle, which contained boiling water, rebounded from the stove, and the contents distributed themselves over Flora's legs. She "registered" pain!

As I hinted last week, Wid's Daily, the American news sheet, got badly off the straight and narrow way with its news of Eille Norwood's visit to America. I can assure Wid's that Mr. Norwood (a) is not going to America; (b) never intended going; (c) has never been asked to go; and (d) has no purpose of his own to fulfil there even if he did go. So that fairly settles it.

If any scenarist has any scenarios for two-reel comedies for disposal and will communicate with me I will pass on their names and addresses to a gentleman who has asked me to find him such scenarios.

Was at the first night of "The Rattlesnake" at the Shaftesbury Theatre on Tuesday, and must congratulate the bunch of film celebrities who are associated with the production on their efforts and success. Rafael Sabatini, the author of the story, has kept well up to his high reputation, while the four film artistes in the leading parts did excellently, these being Milton Rosmer, J. Fisher White, Teddy O'Neil and Lawrence Anderson. Evidently their association with the silent drama has certainly not adversely affected their stage technique.

The Revd. A. Humphrey-Townsend, who plays on the film as Thomas H. Arthur, is holding a meeting at the Seven Dial's Hall on Monday, January 16, with the novel object of instituting a series of religious services for film artistes. I wish the venture success; but hae ma doots!

The studios at Watcombe Hall, Torquay, have been taken over by a newly-formed company known as the Raleigh King Film Productions, which is now busily at work there. At the head of the new concern is R. N.

Raleigh King, who has an extensive stage and film experience. Mr. King has appeared in several West End productions with Sir Charles Hawtrey, and also in the film "A Message From Mars." The director of productions is H. B. Humberston Wright, and the Cameraman is Arthur Smith.

As a location finder for Stoll's, young Baynam Honri gives new proof of his enterprise and success almost every week. For certain scenes in "The Bruce Partington Plans" (one of the episodes in "The Further Adventures of Sherlock Holmes") he has just secured the co-operation of the Metropolitan Railway, even to the extent of the running of a special train for the benefit of the camera. In this story, a man is supposed to be thrown out of the window of a house overlooking a railway on to one of the carriage roofs of a passing train. At Neasdon, one day last week, a train bearing the necessary "body" was specially provided by the Metropolitan Railway Company, free of charge; and at Gloucester Road, on the same day, a genuine railway inspector played the part of being himself in some scenes that were taken on the line, and acquitted himself extremely well.

Popped into St. James' Theatre last night in order to verify the eulogistic notices that all the daily Press were giving to Donald Searle's impersonation of "Slightly" in "Peter Pan." I then understood why the Press was so generous in its reports: Donald, who made such a hit in Hugh Croise's "Four Men in a Van," is perfectly comic, and his performance is an outstanding delight in Barrie's fine play.

It is some time now since I saw Manora Thew in a studio, and her return is all the more welcome. A few years ago Manora Thew was among the artistic "high lights," being one of the old London stars. Owing to the fact that Evelyn Brent has not been able to complete work in her present film in time to take part in Kenelm Foss's new production, "A Romance of Old Baghdad," Manora Thew has been cast for the heroine part. Her reappearance in this film of the Orient will be a very welcome one.

Read this and marvel both at the record and at the coincidence it contains: From January, 24, 1921, to January 24, 1922, George Ridgewell will have directed, for Stoll, 65 reels of completed film, or, roughly, one five-reeler each four weeks; and the completion of the 65th reel will also be the completion of the 65th film that George has directed. All I can add is that I am amazed at the output and marvel as to how it is done. Incidentally, George holds another record; he has never advertised himself in the Press in his life. Unfortunately, he is going to break this record—see next week's coloured cover.

FRONT COVER BIOGRAPHIES

XVII.—GEOFFREY MALINS

Geoffrey H. Malins, O.B.E., whose portrait appears on the front page of this issue, had a most vivid experience in France as the chief official kinematographer of the war. His most notable film, which caused a great sensation at the time, was "The Battle of the Somme."

Mr. Malins has many successful British pictures to his credit, including, "The Greater Love," "Patricia Brent, Spinster," "All the Winners," and "Watching Eyes." The latter is now being shown with considerable success in America.

Mr. Malins is at present directing for the Hardy Film Co., Ltd., at the Worton Hall Studios, Isleworth, a series of Rafael Sabatini stories. The first picture, "Bluff," has been trade shown, and unanimously acclaimed as one of the best British pictures of the year. The world's rights of "Bluff" have been acquired by Gaumont.

Mr. Malins' second production for Hardy, "The Recoil," has been secured by the Stoll Co., and will be Trade shown shortly. The third picture completed is "The Scourge," a tale of the Great Plague of London, which is expected to rank with the "big" productions of the day.

Mr. Malins has created great interest in the kinema world by his declaration that hypnotism, used judiciously in the control of his artistes, is most valuable to a director. By reacting down to the subconscious mind he is able to get more vivid results than by any other method.

MOROCCO— Being the Adventures in Search

December 28.

There was a large crowd to see us off at Victoria, with both of whom I shook hands. If the platform tickets our friends bought were placed end to end they would have fallen short of Big Ben, so great was the crowd. If tied in a bundle with string, they would be as thick as a roomful of renters. ("The K.R.S. is the closest corporation in the kingdom," someone said in Court the other day. "Corporation" is a good word.)

December 29.

I am now able to write of the voyage in a more detached manner. When I boarded the gallant little barque that intended (I hoped) to take us across the Channel, I was reminded of "Eight Weeks," although it was actually larger than the regulation boat used in the famous "bumping" races.

Half an hour after the time for starting the engines began to play. Inspiring tune, too—"Hearts of Oak are our Ships, Jolly Tars are our Men." It put new life into me, like "Black and White" whisky. I felt like Hannibal setting out for Carthage. (If he actually did this, I don't know. Anyhow, it doesn't affect my feeling as he might have felt. Not a bit.) Suddenly we were in the Channel.

My travelling companion, Crispin Hay, had been strapped into a deck-chair which was fastened with ropes to the boat. Every twenty minutes for the previous two hours he had taken a square pill from a little box. (Powdered verses of the Koran mixed with hashish, I fancy.) He had that beautiful dazed expression worn so well by Gish in "Broken Blossoms," and every time we looped the loop he said "Allah!"

But I would not be strapped. It is against my democratic instincts. So I danced upon the deck. You know the new scissor-like step. I got that right at once. I had been practising for hours at home without success, and yet it came to me quite easily. I did it from side to side, and the boat seemed to help me.

Then, as the boat got further out to sea, I changed my steps and did a Highland reel or so—to be precise, a double Scotch. (Joke in film Trade.)

On reaching Calais we found that we had an hour and a half to wait for the train. They hadn't expected us at the station, and were just putting up the shutters, but with true French politesse they asked us to wait on the platform, and let us do what we liked till we were tired of it.

In return we entertained the Customs officials. We had seventeen baggages. Seventeen! That went very well. We had five porteurs. That charmed them.

"Has Monsieur anything to declare?"

"Yes," replied I; "heaps of things. First of all, I declare myself henceforward an ardent Free Trader. Then I have several thousand feet of kinematograph film."

The effect was magical. An awful silence fell suddenly upon the Douanes. Immediately my audience divided itself into small whispering groups. After a time each group appointed ambassadors, who visited other groups. Then the great hall was cleared and the troops ordered in.

They closed around me. The Generalissimo advanced towards me and stood in silence over my case of film. "My films are bonded through to Tangier," I implored, and explained that there were no papers necessary as the box bore the seal of His Britannic Majesty's Customs. No effect. I showed him my Government despatch case. A slight impression. I fired my biggest gun: "Je suis une expédition kinematographique officielle à Maréchal Lyautey au Maroc."

The whole assembly falls back in admiration, and the soldiers salute. My victory is greater than I can bear, so I let Hay finish the job off. He retires with the Generalissimo and his films into a private apartment, and a quarter of an hour later they emerge.

Hay's eyes were very bright.

Personally, I love even their vin ordinaire.

Well—all's well that ends well, and I will never say I was not grateful for my cup of coffee. But I think it very wrong indeed to send young men like ourselves across the sea on such boats in such weather with such cargo.

(My next letter will tell how we met Sir Percy Sykes in Paris and of our visits both official and unofficial there.)

FLASHBACKS—No. 1. THE AGENCY

by Major H. HODGSON-BENTLEY

THE Agent sat in his marble halls,
With dozens of "stills" around his walls.
Each had many a paragraph—
Stars of the Kinematograph.
These gods never called in their lordly way
To enquire for work, as the crowd folk may.

THE Agent's man sat in the outer place,
Feverishly searching a photograph case.
Filing and placing the Joans and the Jills
In separate drawers from the Freds and the Bills.
These gods always called in their way
To enquire for work as the crowd folk may.

THE crowdmen sat in the waiting-room,
Far from the tang of the salt sea's spume.
The telephone bell rang shrill and fast,
And they knew that a studio wanted a cast.
They panicked and pushed in their wonderful way,
And scrummed as only the crowd folk may.

"HELLO," said the Agent, over the wires,
"Yes, old boy*bzzzzzzkkk, this is Fryers."
Three pretty girls—man—bald as a coote,
Hustle right down cos' they're waiting to shoot.
The gods rushed straight down in their breathless way,
And drew one pound one at the end of the day.

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

Hugh E. Wright, in addition to his recognised histrionic ability, is a skilled wielder of the pen. By the courtesy of the Actor we are able to reproduce, in serial form, one of Hugh's literary effusions.

THE JABBERBOSS.

'Twas earlsome and the Kinecoves
Did grimp and grumble on the woad;
All powky where the burrogroves
And the bamsides esquode.
"Beware the Jabberboss, my son,
The eyes that bite, the frenzied snort!
Beware the kamrahman, and shun
The mid-day glass of port!"
He took his haversack in hand,
Long time the studio he sought;
The Tubes had struck, "It's just my luck,
"I shall be late," he thought.
And as he reached the portal there
The Jabberboss with eyes of slate
Came forging through the Kamrahmen,
And cried, "My boy, you're late!"
One, two—One, two, his vestments flew
To right, to left, as though alive!
And quick—Oh, quick—he spread on thick
Great chunks of Number Five.
The scene was set, the men were free,
The camera stood there neat and new;
The Jabberboss was there, but he Argued—a point of view.
The set was seen, they even found
The Kamrahman was there as well;
The Jabberboss was sniffing round
Trying to trace a smell.
The men were free, the scene was set,
The workers waited in a bunch;
The Jabberboss—I can't forget—
Said, "Now, I'm going to lunch."
At half-past two they found, I ween,
The scene was set without a doubt;
The Jabberboss rehearsed a scene,
And then—he cut it out.
The Jabberboss was ready quite,
The scene was set. I heard him yell, "Turn fast!" But day fast turned to night,
The sun had set as well.
"And hast thou faced the Jabberboss?"
Come to my arms, my movie star,
Thy fame is ripe—we'll sup on tripe,
Caloo! Calay! Calah!"
Straight to parental arms he flew,
"Father, I'm fined five bob! Alack!
"We didn't take—and all I make
"Are my expenses back!"
'Twas earlsome and the kinecoves
Did grimp and grumble on the woad;
All powky where the burrogroves
And the bamsides esquode.*
When Alice had finished there was a dead silence. She opened her eyes, and finding the entire company staring at her solemnly, she felt very embarrassed.
"That's all!" she said at last, as nobody seemed inclined to break the silence.
"Well, there's nothing like getting it thoroughly cut of the system," said the little comedian, brightly, after a pause.
"If it only meant something, it wouldn't matter so much," said a plaintive voice from the end of the table.
"If it had only been in English, it might have meant something," said someone else, scornfully.
"It meant something to me!" said the Star, proudly. He had apparently come back into the room while Alice had her eyes shut. "It was subtle, of course, but I think I may say I got it. It was the delivery which was at fault. My dear child," he added, turning to Alice, "where did you get your delivery?"
"Carter, Paterson, I think," said Alice, not feeling very certain about it.
The Star subsided again.

"What did it mean exactly?" said the Comedian to Alice.

"I'm not quite sure," said Alice doubtfully. "It seemed to come into my head as I went along."

"Well, you got it out again, before it had time to do any damage," said the Comedian, hopefully.

"That's the worst of keeping an open mind!" put in a tall, angular woman, who had been sitting knitting firmly all the time the argument had been going on. "People say—keep an open mind. Tchah! I don't believe it. Things get in."

"Don't you ever open it?" asked Alice.

"Never!" was the reply. "I've got my own ideas, and I keep 'em! Shut! Tight!!

"They must get so stuffy——" began Alice.

"Stuffy!" snorted the angular one. "Stuffy! I'll give you a piece of my mind, young lady!" And, as Alice said afterwards: "It was such a hard, cornery piece, she dropped it under the table and pretended not to notice it."

Fortunately for her, perhaps, at that moment the Director came back into the room, and said: "Say, people! We gotter get along with the next scene! I got a theory for it, which spells Success with a capital 'S.'"

"I didn't know theories could spell," whispered Alice to the Comedian.

"Oh, yes!" he answered. "He's always getting hold of a theory which spells Success. The worst of it is, it can never get anybody to pronounce it afterwards. Well, we've got to get at it. And he'll mess about for hours explaining that theory of his," he added savagely.

Everybody had trooped out by this time in the wake of the Director; and Alice was left alone, save for a very, very old, old man, who had come across to her, and stood gazing at her with such kind, dreamy eyes, that Alice couldn't help being reminded of the White Knight somehow.

"Please are you the White Knight?" asked Alice; he looked so exactly like him.

"Only an old actor I'm afraid, my dear," said he, kindly.

"But some old actors are knights, aren't they?" asked Alice.

"I fear I thought more of Art than of myself," said the old Actor, sadly. "It was a mistake, of course."

"Everybody makes mistakes sometimes, don't they," said Alice. "I do, I know! You mustn't be ashamed of it."

"There are some mistakes one can be definitely proud of," he answered—and repeated: "Definitely proud of."

Alice didn't quite see how you could be proud of mistakes, so she didn't say anything.

"KINEMA CLUB PRODUCTIONS"

There is an important significance in the announcement made by the Executive Committee of the Kinema Club respecting "The Kinema Club Productions."

It will be remembered that Justice Coleridge in the recent "Castles in Spain" law suit, stated that he found considerable difficulty in discovering exactly what "a first-class British standard Kinematograph film" really is. And it must be generally conceded that there is no such thing as an all-round model British film. This can be remedied by the Club Productions.

The policy of the Club is for the members to produce one five-reel feature a year. This will be of the highest British standard, for it will be directed, cast and photographed by the best British directors, artistes and cameramen. There is no producing company in existence that could ever make such a picture, for the simple reason that no company could afford to enlist the services of such a personnel, for even the minor parts will be played by recognised stars.

The details of the scheme are to be settled by a Select Committee that will be composed of the heads of the leading British producing organisations. In the meantime the Executive Committee explain that all engaged on the production will be paid nominal salaries and the whole proceeds of the picture will be passed into the General Funds of the Club. The object in view is to obviate the necessity of making further financial demands on individual members and so ensure that subscription fees will not be increased from their present figure. There will also be formed a Benevolent fund for the relief of necessitous cases among members and for the provision of Legal and Medical services.

The Executive Committee is anxious to point out that there will be no competition with existing producing concerns, as in no circumstances whatever will more than one picture be made annually. Efforts have not yet been made to dispose of the rights of the production, which will be commenced forthwith, but already offers have been received, one of which, from one of the three leading organisations in America, is for £5,000 above what it costs the Club to produce the picture for the U.K. rights and another large sum for the American rights. We understand that the Committee hopes to include the Kinema Club Productions in the Schedule of the British National Film League.

"THE THEATRE CAME FIRST"

by M. P. PROUT

The art of the screen may be conveniently divided into (1) the art of story construction, (2) the art of acting, (3) the art of photography, and (4) the art of making the best use of, or combining and co-ordinating the other three—the art of producing.

These are being held in check by the novelist, the stage actor, the stage producer, and by the fact that, through the length and breadth of England and America, there is no evidence in the film world of a single photographer.

It is of the unsuitability of the stage producer and the absence of photographic art—two phases of the same fundamental trouble (for artless photography is the correlative of visual obsession)—that I would presently dwell upon.

In the old days—before the birth of the photoplay—I had considerable practice in the photographing of stage scenes, and, during the hours (amounting sometimes to the whole night) that I awaited my cues, I watched with great interest the methods of stage producers.

Now, the whole object of a stage scene is to appeal to the eye direct, and visual appeal becomes a cult or obsession, and a necessary and integral part of the very organisation of a stage producer. He, like the painter, never takes kindly to a transference of the appeal to any other medium—such as, in the case of the screen, the photographic. This has had a most profound effect in shaping the trend of the screen—an effect, on the whole, highly prejudicial to its natural and healthy development.

How, for instance, can a stage producer, unable to realise the nature and stringency of the limitations of the photographic process, make the best—or any—use of its particular excellencies? What is he likely to know of such an essential branch of the art of photography as photographic pictorial composition? If he so much as scents its very existence, does he not regard it as a subject to be picked up by the way?

The fact remains that English and American films are lacking in any kind of artistic photographic finish—the most patent of all the contributing factors in the artistry of a medium entirely dependent in its presentation on photographic appeal. We are driven to agree with Dulac that, "pictorially, the composition of film scenes is at present generally very bad." They recall to my mind the photographs I used to obtain of stage scenes—striking examples of the facility with which one can combine in one and the same result technical excellence with pictorial worthlessness—for, subjects conceived (and lighted) visually are, far more often than not, the very antithesis of pictorial photographability.

I have stated above that no evidence exists of the employment of a photographer (as such) in the producing of photoplays (in England and America). By "photographer" (without any qualification such as "amateur," "professional," "technical," etc.), I mean one versed in one or more branch or branches of the art of photography—one possessing necessary natural taste developed by practice. As we have the art and technics of building—the architect and the builder—so we have in photography the "photographer" and the technician, the photo-aesthete and the photo-craftsman.

Now, of these branches of the art of photography, two stand out as of special importance in the art of the screen, viz., photographic pictorial composition and photographic lighting (natural and artificial), and both have been sacrificed to the visual cult resulting from stage influence insidiously permeating or blatantly perverting their intrinsic merits.

There is no evidence (from results) that interior or exterior ("location") backgrounds are selected, sets designed, or groupings arranged on the basis of their photographic pictorial suitability, or on any other than their visual appeal—stage art—screen artlessness.

I have always maintained that if the English film-producing firms did not grasp the importance of photographic art some other nation would. Sweden (not to mention some other continental countries, in a lesser degree) has, with greater insight into the nature and possibilities of screen art, taken this step. Some recent specimens of Scandinavian work have been shown in which every exposure is a picture—not a photographic representation of a visually selected or visually constructed scene, like our own—and in this particular they are a great advance on the English and American films.

It is this, and this mainly if not solely, which constitutes them a "class of their own." The Swedes employ photographers, and the evidence of their artistic work is a great relief—indeed, a sheer delight.

There is one other branch of the art of photography which is also of paramount importance in film production—photographic lighting, that elusive art which has for its object the arrangement of lights (or of subjects), so that the visual and photographic effects shall more closely coincide, and shall result in a picture that is both pleasing and true.

Artificial lighting is a particularly difficult subject, and no country has yet (in film practice) got beyond the visual stage. The Swedes and some of the best directors in other countries (including Chaplin) avoid it whenever possible. The need for it is, perhaps, greater in England than in any other country (and I believe there is no country where more attention has, outside film practice, been given to it), and a chance occurs for the English to develop it—though I entertain no hope whatever that it will either be seen or grasped.

The system in use at present is an adaptation of, and a direct descendant from, stage lighting (with, perhaps, an infusion of shop lighting), with modifications in detail, but not in principle, introduced by every kind of other-than-photographic expert. The art of photographic lighting has not, even in its elementary aspects, been as yet applied to it.

Truly, Brieux, the distinguished French dramatist, sums up the shortcomings of the screen in one short sentence: "The theatre came first!" The stage producer turns film director, and selects everything from the "beauty prize girl" to a vase of flowers to please his retina, and, when satisfied with the effect, expects a "cameraman" to reproduce it.

It can't be done.

Money—the root of all evil—is at the bottom of the artlessness of the screen. Capitalists and men of business have been induced to deal in a form of art they have not the type of mental gear to understand, and it is their fault that the novelist "writes" (anomalous word!) or "visualises" (accursed word!) stories for the silent photodrama; the stage star directed by the stage producer does his or her best to brand it with a damnable mediocrity; and technical experts of all kinds are engaged to churn the mixture into celluloid pills with a soporific action.

And all this band of lightly engaged and heavily paid employees—opportunists many of them—have created in the films a kind of vested interest—strengthening every day—which, like other vested interests, will take a lot of eradicating before the screen can come into its own.

And money will cure it.

Some capitalist will "happen" who can grasp the nature of the screen and deal with it as the alluring art it is, or, rather, might be. And as, unlike English films which are too "natural," art is international, he, likely enough, will discover therein "the potentiality of becoming rich beyond the dreams of avarice."

I agree with Denison Clift that, "without artistic achievement commercial achievement is impossible to-day." Does he, I wonder, agree with me that the cult of the visual is the curse of the kinema?

IN THE GOOD OLD DAYS

by CYRIL PERCIVAL

Have I been a film actor long, sir?
I was one of the first in the line.

I played in a stable at Ealing
In the year nineteen hundred and nine.
I did heroes for seven and sixpence,
And villains for half a crown less.
I wore riding boots as the former,
As the latter—just evening dress.

We had to work hard in those days, sir,
On parts we had no time to feel;
I did Henry the Eighth in a day, sir,
With all the six wives—in one reel.
The next day I played David Garrick—
We finished on that before night—
They turned on the "big scene" so fast, sir,

I didn't have time to get tight!
Becket and Sweeney Todd next day—
Half a reel each, so to speak.
Then Saturday being half a day, sir,
We did Trilby to finish the week.

Our mansions were built out of canvas,
Two palms and a couple of flats;
We dressed and made up in the loft, sir,
Where the boss every day "got the rats."

Yes, I gave up the stage for the screen, sir,
Just to give the new "biz" a leg-up,
But after some years at the game, sir,
I think they have "sold me a pup."
Do you know what I was on the stage, sir?
When I left, I'd a fortune at stake,
And I sacrificed that for the films, sir,
I was juvenile man with Lew Lake.
They don't want good actors to-day, sir,
For these new fangled pictures they make;
When I tell them I'm expert with crepe hair,

They say they can see it's a fake.
I can tumble, do knock-about business,
And give and receive some good swipes;
Put on any make-up you like, sir,
But now—all they want—is just "types."

What's that?—Well, I could—thank you kindly.

Don't think I was asking—I'm proud—
I'll see that you get it back soon, sir,
If Jay hasn't fixed his next crowd.

Should you hear anything—don't mind
what, sir,

From a crowd to a dive in the Thames;
You can always find me at the club, sir,
Up the street here, you know, yes, De Hems!

YOUR CORNER

WHAT U.S. THINKS OF US

In a letter to the Editor, M. Montague, head of the Montague Studios in San Francisco, writes:—

As an Englishman engaged in picture production here, I have greatly enjoyed the gossip in THE MOTION PICTURE STUDIO. Your paper started a lively discussion among the artistes working here as to the relative abilities of English and American screen actors. Some of the comments may be of interest:—

"Englishwomen can't act—but look like frights."—"They don't know how to dress their hair."—"Their men have class, but lack pep."—"Their pictures deal too much with the upper classes."—"Charlie Chaplin owes everything to American methods."

These are a few of the criticisms expressed by the fair-minded in the crowd. The "hyphenated American," of course, can see nothing good in anything British, but the better class of American artistes wish every success to British actors and directors.

The Press of America is practically unanimous in declaring that something will have to be done to save the industry over here, due to poor stories, immoral suggestion and improbability of situation. So it will be seen that we have some house-cleaning to do if we are to prevent foreigners from taking a commanding lead over us in the production of moving pictures.—M. MONTAGUE.

AGENTS and SCHOOL PUPILS.

In answer to "Capt. A. E. V.," I think the reason for refusing to engage pupils from the so-called kinema "schools" is fairly obvious. Those schools get a very bad name for fee-snatching, and encourage any pupil irrespective of talent.

After taking from them every penny, they then advise them to try the agencies and studios.

In view of the unsuitability of most of the applicants, is it a wonder that the agents and studios fight shy of them?—FREDA KAYE.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A HAIR-RAISING PART.

Having duly considered the following incidents, I am inclined to the belief that a more intelligent appreciation in general is requisite, and that the arts of "type spotting" by one section of the profession and "make up" by another are surely becoming things of the past.

Some few days ago a little party of artistes, having during the morning interviewed an agent, were given appointments for a later hour with a director. Passing over briefly their inability to reach the Holy of Holies owing to the forgathering of a few (?) of "The Great Majority," they were ultimately met with the intimation that only men with moustaches were wanted, Spanish types being required. I believe that, owing to face fungus being conspicuous by its absence amongst actors as a rule, search of the surrounding by-ways was resorted to.

I cannot help thinking that there must have been amongst that heaving crowd (and it did heave) men who were true to type and acquainted with the art of make-up, apart from that which only combats lighting.

But, perhaps, an Essau-like upper lip is preferable to a stiff one, and I suppose crepe hair and spirit gum are unknown.

At another agent's I heard a man whose studies of "Ancients" are not quite unworthy of note, and who also has a 16-year-old son who is acquainted with the interior of more than one studio, turned down as too young to play a middle-aged part. Ca re fait rein!

"The Sport of Kings."

Granger-Davidson. Starring Phyllis Shannaw and Victor MacLaglan. Supported by Cyril Percival and Douglas Munro. Written and directed by Arthur Rooke. Photographed by Leslie Eveleigh.

While "The Sport of Kings" is not epoch-making, it is a very good all-round photoplay, which is on the whole a worthy addition to the series of ever-improving British films. It has very strong points both of acting and production; its weak ones are the conventionality of the story—which is absolutely hackneyed—and several instances of jumpy continuity which suggest hasty editing. But Arthur Rooke has undoubtedly given us a bright and gripping entertainment, essentially British atmosphere, and three good sporting events, of which the last—the steeplechase—is a real triumph.

This being in the classification of sporting dramas, it follows inevitably that the hero's troubles pile up until everything stands or falls in the issue of the big race. The convention is unfortunately so thoroughly understood that the suspense interest in the story itself is nil—the most unsophisticated fan knows what is going to happen. This means a distinct fall in the artistic value of the drama as a whole, and the director has to concentrate on gripping his public by each incident. But in this he is admirable. The sentimental touches (notably the rescue of the mongrel at Lea Bridge), and, still more, the sporting events are handled with masterly skill. The boxing contest is rather long drawn out, and the suggestion of foul play is not fully explained; but the final race, with the close up of the ding-dong finish, we have never seen excelled.

Casting has been remarkably successful. Victor MacLaglan again gives proof that he is more than an athlete. He is, perhaps, rather heavy-handed in his bluff and breezy animal spirits, but any excess in this direction makes for life and vigour and is in keeping with the character. Phyllis Shannaw looks her part to perfection, and one regrets not to have seen bigger demands made upon her talents. The faithful friend, taken by Cyril Percival, is another good characterisation of a rather complex personality. He is a social reformer, a sportsman and a lover, and throughout an attractive, sympathetic and manly man. Douglas Munro gives an efficient reading of a very conventional "wicked uncle" type.

Camera work is in all the most important scenes excellent, but fluctuates in quality once or twice. There is some very clever work shown where long-shots dissolve into semi-close-ups. This is, unlike many camera tricks, a real artistic gain.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Almost always excellent.

LEADS: Strong and effective.

SUPPORTS: Good throughout.

LITERARY: Threadbare story: exciting incidents, but continuity occasionally jumpy.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Sporting scenes are the best; but efficient throughout.

LIGHTING: Good.

KINEMA CLUB NEWS

Messages of congratulation are pouring in with reference to the wonderful progress that has been made with the Club. Full arrangements have now been made for the Opening Ceremony, which takes place on Sunday, January 22, and which will be performed by A. E. Newbould, M.P., Vice-President of the Club, and who will be supported by other officials and leading personalities in the Trade.

The Opening will be followed by an Informal Dance and Musical Program, over which the Chairman of the Club will preside. To these festivities all members are freely admitted, of course, and have the right to introduce one guest each.

Arrangements have been made for the provision of a Light Cold Supper on the premises, for an inclusive price of three shillings; and, for those who do not wish to avail themselves of this, there will be a buffet at which refreshments will be sold at cost price.

NOT EVENING DRESS.

The total membership is now 400. Rules and constitution have been framed, and committees have been hard at work, so that, at the opening, all the departments of the Club will be functioning. The catering is in the hands of an experienced manager and cook. American dishes will be a speciality, and for special occasions a Chinese cook has been retained to introduce hitherto unknown Chinese dishes and sweets.

The bar will be fully equipped and fully licensed.

Applications for membership should be seen to the General Secretary, Kinema Club, 93, Long Acre, W.C.2, until the Opening, after which 9, Great Newport Street, W.C.1, will be the address. The annual subscription is Five Guineas; life membership, Twenty-five Guineas.

It is explained that the money collected at the recent general meeting will be devoted to some of the heavy expenses in connection with the above functions, orchestra, etc.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To mark the Opening of the Club the next issue of the STUDIO will be a Special Club Souvenir Number. The cover will be a reproduction, in colour, of a photograph of George Ridgewell, and photographs of many of the members of committees will be inside, together with special Club photographs, artistes and interviews. A special feature will be "My Message to the Club," from leading persons in the State and in the profession. Extra copies of this special issue should be ordered, and those who wish to take advantage of the extra advertising facilities should send instructions by Wednesday morning next at the latest.

ON WRITING SCENARIOS

V.—Writing for an Individual Artiste

by GERTRUDE M. ALLEN

IS it the story or the "star" which draws the multitudes into the picture houses? It is a moot point. But whether or not the title of a film or the name of the leading player in it is the greatest attraction, certain it is that there are more than a "baker's dozen" of picture players whose names are magnets to the picturegoer and who are the unseen idols of many a household.

Names loom up on the mental horizon in brilliant and quick succession—and they are only a representative few of the "stars" who have risen to the topmost pinnacle of film fame. And each name is associated with a "part" which is individual—characteristic of the player's ability, and the sine qua non of their success.

ceive a suitable story for, say, Nazimova—the great Russian player, whose work is always associated with "heavy," emotional and colourful roles. But you might well devote your exertions in an attempt to give Alma Taylor a vehicle for the expression of her art, which is the interpretation of typical English girlhood.

And now I must be on the defensive, for I can hear you arguing that a really competent player should be able to play any sort of part! And you argue rightly. They should be able to—and they are. Nevertheless, if you make it your business to follow their work, you will discover, almost without exception, that no matter what roles they play, these artistes appear, invariably, in the type of part which suits their own individual talent—and it is to this individual talent that you must pander if you would hope to be successful in creating new roles for them.

When you commence on the construction of a scenario which is intended to provide a star player with the leading role, you are liable, in your zeal to be worthy of such distinction, to make a common mistake. We will assume that the potential heroine of your story is Norma Talmadge. Now, clever as this popular screen actress is, it will not be humanly possible for her to create and sustain an indefinite personal appeal through six or seven thousand feet of film! She will be the predominant force in it—the impelling character around whom you will build your story—but it takes more than one player to make a story.

Therefore, do not lay your whole creative faculty at the feet of Norma Talmadge; if you do, it will fade and die, and find burial there! No matter how many lesser roles your story demands, each one of these is, in itself (or should be, if your scenario is a good one), a vitally important part of the whole. To each of these minor characters you must devote that period of analysis and construction which it justifiably demands. If you are wise enough to do this, you will inevitably find that the result is an enhanced compliment to the "star," for it is an infinitely easier task for a player to interpret a certain part successfully if she is "supported" by a company of clever and important artistes, than it is if the whole work falls on her own slim shoulders, and there is nobody else in the film who "matters."

A survey of the work of any established leading player will provide amplification of this statement. Does not a Pickford film always introduce two or more clever characterisations besides the one in which "Little Mary" shines?

So let your slogan be—Arabella Brown "and Company," for without the "and Company" there would never be any "Arabella Browns"!

In a previous chapter of this series I advised the amateur scenarist to devote his energies to the creation of stories which could be interpreted by an all-round company, for writing around one player is a complicated task—and wasted labour if you do not sell your scenario!

But, when you have been successful, and a scenario has been accepted, you are armed with the knowledge that you have conquered the initial difficulties of the art, and are qualified to rank amongst the screen authors. Then it is that you will discover an even more remunerative method of authorship—writing for a "star."

Before you seriously consider this ambitious undertaking, make a comprehensive study of the different types of players who are famous for their work, and decide, in your own mind, which artiste specialises in the interpretation of the sort of story which you can create.

If your capacity for creation is limited to the telling of a simple love story, set in the every-day scenes of life, you will find it an almost impossible task to con-

IMPROVING THE CAMERA

A new kine-camera has been introduced into the American studios by George A. Mitchell, and this, according to the Motion Picture News, possesses a number of exclusive features which should be of interest to British kine-cameramen.

The Mitchell camera, as described by the inventor, is in two parts: the camera box and the base, both of which are cast of aluminum alloy each in one piece. Mounted on the base frame are the iris, four way mattes, matte disc, turret plate and turret. The box is mounted on dovetail guides or tracks which are a part of the base. The box slides by movement of a handle in the rear which operates pinions meshing with racks. A release button in the centre of the handle operates a locking mechanism so that in either position the camera box is securely locked in place. The camera box may be instantly shifted from the photographing position to the focussing position or vice versa with one hand.

Focussing is accomplished by shifting the camera to one side by a turn of the handle on the rear of the base. The focussing tube on the door of the camera is brought immediately behind the lens by the above shift. When the focussing is completed, a turn of the handle brings the camera box back directly behind the lens and the focussing tube on the door becomes a finder. The focussing tube carries a series of magnifiers and the magnified image can be seen on the ground glass of this tube when it is focussing position back of the lens, or in photographing position back of the finder lens. This manner of changing from focussing to photographing position is claimed to be highly advantageous, for there is no movement of the lens. The operation is practically instantaneous and requires only the half turn of the handle.

The movement of the film is accomplished by a three-cam mechanism. A three-cornered cam moves the pins up and down. A second cam of the same design but smaller operates the pins in and out, a third cam relieves the tension as the pins enter the perforation of the film and applies the tension again as the pins leave the perforation after the film has been advanced. Through a cycle of operation the film is held in contact with the aperture by the face cam, as the pins enter the film perforation the pressure is released so that the film may be advanced while it is free. The pressure is again applied as the pins are withdrawn. During the exposure the film is positively held in position, but during the advance of the film there is no tension. The pins fit the perforation thus insuring correct registration. A test was made in the factory by running the camera at high speed eight hours each day for ten days. At the end of that time it was found the glass-hardened cams and cam guides showed practically no wear.

Immediately in front of the shutter and inserted in the base is a revolving circular matte disc which fits within the front plate containing twelve stock mattes and space where a special slide or matte of any size or shape may be inserted. This disc is operated from the outside. Any desired matte may be turned to position in front of the aperture by releasing an index pin. This feature insures all mattes are protected and are ready for immediate use at any instant.

There are also four way mattes which make possible any rectangular opening. All four mattes may be operated together or each may be operated independently. These, like the stock mattes, are on the inside of the instrument protected from dust, and so placed that there is no danger of reflections from electric lights.

An iris is pivotally mounted within the camera, and is adjustable to any part of the aperture. The Iris may be moved up and down or from one side to the other by the turning of thumb nuts. An automatic shutter is provided for making lap dissolves and fadeouts. The maximum opening of the shutter is one hundred and seventy degrees, and the shutter, an invention of Mitchell's, is made on the planetary gear type mounted with ball bearings. The shutter may be operated to close in either two, four or eight foot exposure of the film. When the shutter closes it trips and applies a brake which may be released by pressing a button on top of the camera. Another feature added to the shutter is that the length of the fadeout may be extended over a longer period of exposure if so desired.

The Mitchell camera has a rising and falling front. By pressing on a knob, a pinion is disengaged from a stop, and by turning this knob the turret revolves slightly giving the equivalent of a fifteen-degree tilt of the tripod without distortion of the image. The front is graduated so that the lens may be brought to centre. The turret revolves independently of the mechanism.

In the focussing tube there is a slot in which a slide may be placed immediately in front or behind the ground glass. The object of this is that ground celluloid may be placed on the rear of the glass while the camera is in focussing position. The

Many times I have pointed out the advantages derived by those employing cameramen, if they get in touch with Kenneth Gordon, the secretary of the K.C.S. Being a member of the society means that, at least, one is well established in the Trade as a cameraman. Naturally, there are cameramen and cameramen. Some cameramen have been in the Trade for quite a while, and yet have never attained anything in a photographic line that is a credit to them.

* * *

According to reports from America, the era of the daylight studio is past, and almost every American studio these days is entirely lighted by artificial light. Recently I had the misfortune to see some French pictures, which were taken in a daylight studio; these demonstrated the advantages of the dark studio more eloquently than words could express. The dark studio opens up a new era in the production business. No longer are English directors able to complain of lack of sunshine. No longer is it necessary to spend hours waiting for the sun. Then it has its other advantages. Lighting effects, quite impossible with sunshine, but not with "Sunlight," can now vastly improve the motion picture.

* * *

The Lasky studio in America is using a new idea for filming night scenes. Instead of having a light behind each window to give the effect of night life, the windows of the set are now painted with silver paint, and when Sunlights get shining on the windows, it gives the effect of a lighted window, and saves placing lights behind each. If curtains are needed on the window, it is only necessary to paint in a pair of curtains with brown paint.

* * *

Another innovation, which might be useful to cameramen, is the idea used for giving the effect of a very long passage. Forced perspective, as it is called, is managed in this way. A series of arches are built, each arch being of a different height. The arches are then erected, so that they diminish in size the further they are from the camera. By this means it is possible to have erected on a space of 30 ft. a passage which seems to be 125 ft. long.—"TRIPOD."

cameraman can then cut out any object that is to be matched up in a double exposure. This is for quick and more or less rough work.

The more accurate way is to use a piece of negative which may be inserted in the slide immediately in front of the ground glass, the mask may then be made of any opaque material. A special punch is provided which accurately cuts a frame of negative to fit the slide. The negative may also be used as a matte by cutting out a part of the scene to be double exposed, painting the remainder black and then slipping it into the matte disc and revolving it to the aperture, or placed in a slot in the aperture, which is practically contrast matting. Any thin opaque material may be used.

The turret of the camera has places for four lenses. An index pin conveniently placed locks the turret when the lens comes into position. The regular equipment of the camera includes a one and five-eighths inch, a two inch, and a three-inch lens with matched finder lenses.

The magazines are cast of aluminum alloy. A small spool of the same size as that furnished by manufacturers of films is used in the magazines. With this size it is not necessary to rewind the film or tear out the centre. The magazines are made to accommodate a four hundred foot roll of film.

The throat of the magazine is composed of three velvet-covered rollers in contact. The two outside rollers are on spring bearings which maintain the contact constantly and at an even pressure. The film being drawn out of the feed magazine causes the rollers to revolve, this insures the film being delivered to the take-up magazine and eliminates buckling in the camera. Because of the small spool a high speed take-up has been found most desirable. By using the high speed and a loose belt there is slipping from the start and the last fifty feet of film will take up as easily as the first few feet. The pressure on the crank does not get heavier as the end of the roll is reached.

Each camera is provided with a Veeder film counter built in the camera. This may be set back.

A Personal Message.

FOR a brief moment it is necessary to drop the traditional "we" of editorial columns, because I wish to send a personal message to every member of the Kinema Club. First, however, must be acknowledged the wonderful co-operation and assistance which we have received from the members of the various Committees, and especially from those of the Executive Committee, whose task has at times been almost appalling. To George Ridgwell, without whom the Club would not have been possible, are due more thanks than can be expressed in words. These thanks can only—and must—find expression by the support and loyalty which every member can render to the Club now that it is open. For the great service which he rendered by presiding at the first mass meeting, I want here again to thank Colonel A. C. Bromhead, and—although it is getting rather "near home," as it were—I cannot let the opportunity pass of expressing my thanks, appreciation and gratitude to E. G. Allighan, whose time, already occupied by the cares of this journal, has been devoured for over six months not merely by the vast amount of secretarial work which he has done, but by the entire business details of which there are such an enormous number connected with the accomplishment of this ambitious scheme. What little I have done has been done because, as editor of the Kine and of this paper, I believe that I have a responsibility to the Film Industry beyond that of providing it with newspapers worthy of it. Part of that responsibility I have tried to shoulder by advancing the cause of the Kinema Club. And now, if what has been done is really appreciated by the British producing Industry, if there is a true desire to acknowledge what is due to those who have founded the Club and especially to George Ridgwell, the one way to do it is loyally to support YOUR Club.

Seeing Stars.

DOES the public want stars before everything else? It is a lively field for discussion. That the "star system" had been badly overdone cannot be disputed. If the star is a genuine artiste accepted of the public, is provided with vehicles really suited to his or her talent (as, for example, Charles Ray or W. S. Hart), there is much to be said in favour of the system. But if everything is sacrificed to the manufactured star's grossly exaggerated idea of his or her own Heaven-sent infallibility of genius, then the result is damaging to every angle of production. The elimination of the star, and the replacement by the director cient production and support are, of course, necessary, but the chief essential is the story. The story must primarily be worth while as a story, and, secondarily, it must, to be a successful star vehicle, fit the leading artiste who is to be featured in it. A good story, and a suitable story—these are the things that matter most. Then, if you like, a star to play the chief part, but a star that the part is fitted for. And, in passing, may we add that the reason why there are no British film stars in the sense that there are American film stars is that the people primarily responsible for British pictures are afraid to make stars lest the artistes demand high salaries? Such an outlook does exist, unfortunately, and it is one of the things, if not the thing, which retards the progress of British production.

Rivalry.

THE remarks of A. E. Newbould, M.P., on the ideals of the Kinema Club should be read with much interest. For, while the Club in its present form is mainly a social organisation, one of its many developments must, for its own sake and for the sake of British production, be on the lines suggested by Mr. Newbould. There is a vast difference between jealousy and honest rivalry, but self satisfaction is even a worse thing than jealousy. It is, perhaps, a British characteristic to believe that we have nothing to learn, and this attitude sometimes takes the form of praising the other man's work because by oblique suggestion much praise conveys the idea that all's right in the British producing field. Criticism—frank, honest and competent criticism—of the type advocated by Mr. Newbould, is the soul of improvement. And the encouragement of such competent criticism must become one of the functions of the Club. It can be done by interesting worthwhile authors, producers and other specialists to expound their views to the members by means of lectures or "get together" meetings, at which there is plenty of open and frank discussion.

or the author has been tried—more in America than elsewhere—and has on the whole failed for reasons similar to those which caused the star system to fail: that most of the things that really matter have been sacrificed to the repute—genuine or publicised—of the director or author. Though, in the case of the latter, the chief reason has been the butchering of his story to make it fit the cut and dried conception of a scenario of the kind that "the public wants."

WHILE it cannot be disputed that the public as a mass is far more likely to accept pictures in which established favourites play the chief parts, it has to be realised that this same public will not for very long tolerate pictures which contain nothing but the star. Effi-

Intimate Studio Gossip

Had a long chat with John Gliddon on his arrival back from America where he has been to engage an ingenue for his forthcoming production. He will be casting for this immediately and will commence shooting in February, when he will take his company on location to Nice.

Popped down to Elstree last week and found that there is still an encouraging atmosphere of activity, with three companies either at work or starting. A. V. Bramble is directing Florence Turner in "Little Mother," while Tom Bentley has just started on a comedy called "A Master of Craft." Frank Crane has joined Ideal's directorial staff and is to direct a five-reel drama called "The Lonely Lady of Grosvenor Square."

It is easy to get "windy" these days, but things are not so black as people are prone to paint them. Ideal is busy, and Stoll will be in full swing again in a few days; International is casting and George Clarke intends to resume production. F.P.-Lasky announces that it will cease active studio production for a few weeks, but when this fact is studied it will be found to be not so very ominous, as during the winter most studios slacken down. Furthermore, there has been nothing much doing at Islington for some time as the two companies have been on location in Spain and Italy. We still say: There's a good time coming.

Increased activity and output is the keynote of the New Year resolutions of the Hollandia Studios in Haarlem, Holland, and the film plant in the little town of tulips is even busier than ever. Apart from the fixed number of pictures to be produced for the fulfilment of the Granger-Binger contract, Maurice Binger will present a number of special productions, the first of which is already making steady progress. This is entitled "Thou Shall Not . . ." and is adapted from a famous play. In the cast are Gertrude McCoy, Hugh Willoughby, Zoe Palmer, W. A. Freshman and several other prominent artistes. It is in the hands of George Beranger, a Griffith graduate and popular American director, responsible for many Fox, Metro pictures, etc. New lighting arrangements have been installed at Hollandia, the laboratories overhauled, and everything is now in full working order for the carrying out of the 1922 program. D. E. Doxat-Pratt, who has unfortunately been ill for some weeks, is now well on the road to recovery and already preparing his next script, upon which he hopes to start very shortly.

During the filming of "The Bohemian Girl" at the Alliance Studios, an elaborate scene was recently used. Harley Knoles, who is directing the picture, gathered a large company of sporting gentlemen in the picturesque hunting costumes of the period. Seated round a gorgeously decorated table in a setting that represented an old banqueting hall in Arnheim Castle, a scene of much animation was registered. The festive board was loaded with genuine food and drink, and florally decorated. The setting had been prepared with furnishings that are correct to period and which represent a lavish amount of genuine antiques. When the occasion arose to thank the host (Count Arnheim—played by Henry Vibart) the guests—all English actors who knew no Bohemian songs—substituted the good old English appreciation "For he's a jolly good fellow," which was sung with vigour and enthusiasm. What a good thing it is that the screen does not register language!

In the film world the man of the moment is undoubtedly Jeffrey Bernerd, managing director of the Stoll Film Company, through whose energy, acumen and ability that company has just paid a 15 per cent. dividend on its ordinary shares for the past financial year, in spite of the most serious and prolonged slump in the entertainment business that has occurred within living memory. Jeffrey Bernerd is the youngest managing director in the Industry, either in this country or America,

From what I can gather the Hardy people are racing from triumph to triumph. I understand that "The Recoil" has been sold and that "The Scourge" is turning out to be a great picture. Marjorie Hume, who played the part of heroine in the first Hardy production, "Bluff," is returning to this management in order to play the female lead in its fourth production, "The Reaping," a story of the French Revolution by Rafael Sabatini. The male lead will be played by Stewart Rome, and among the supporting cast will be Pardoe Woodman and Fotheringham Lysons. Geoffrey Malins commenced production this week.

Masters has been busy for some time producing a series of pictures entitled "Tense Moments With Great Authors." These are a series of twelve one-reel subjects portraying the big scene from some famous novel by famous authors, and the first twelve are now completed. Each of these subjects feature a big theatrical star, such as Sybil Thorndike, J. Fisher White, Keryl Bellew, H. V. Esmond, Lyn Harding, Ivan Berlyn, Iris Hoey, Hilda Moore, Milton Rosmer, Charles Garry, Phyllis Neilson Terry, and Ethel Irving, and have been directed by H. B. Parkinson, W. C. Rowden and George Wynn.

THE FOUR VICE — WHAT THEY THINK

A Club with Ideals

by R. E. NEWBOULD, M.P.

Now is the time when all who have the interest of the Club at heart are making and studying suggestions to secure its highest usefulness, and asking themselves what steps should be taken to secure the best results for all the work that has already been put into its organisation. The answer to this question is in my view simple, but its fulfilment presents many difficulties.

The Club will be what its members make it. Unless it has some definite object in view, and pursues it with courage and persistence it will be merely a social club, like so many others.

On the other hand, if it has an ideal, and works for it, it may well be the best thing that has ever happened for British production. Its function should be to convince the public that film production is a great art, and it can only do so by encouraging artistic productions.

Its members must avoid jealousy, but encourage rivalry, and its ideal should be to make British productions supreme.

Now how is that to be done? In my view the best way to do it is to invite criticism from all those qualified to criticise. I should suggest that authors, dramatists, artists, and others could all supply valuable criticisms, not on film technique of course, but each in his own speciality. Authors' views on story value, dramatists' on presentation, artists on the general pictorial results and lighting effects (not methods, of course), furniture, period, and dress experts on their own subjects—all these are going to be of extraordinary interest to the man who takes his profession seriously, and you will get the necessary criticism to secure artistic productions.

Not least important will be the views of the psychologists, who will judge of the effect of a picture on the public. And the way to do all this is to screen the picture to a select audience of critics and to have discussions on it. By this means you will be able to get the views of people like Barrie or Pinero and equally outstanding men in the various branches of art.

The acting side is of the greatest importance, and the artistes should see films and have discussions on the acting.

I have never seen greater restraint and at the same time greater effect than in the acting and production of "Thy Soul shall Bear Witness" in all my life. Although I do not suggest that the Swedish actors can do more than their British colleagues, I should like to submit this film as an example of superb acting.

If it is not feasible to install a small theatre on the Club premises—I certainly think this should be done if possible—I suggest that the use of some private projection room near at hand is essential. If possible I should like to see it so arranged that the film could be stopped at a certain place, to enable a given situation to be talked over.

The producing side of the industry is the one which has always interested me intensely. Unfortunately it seems to me to have one very serious drawback, and that is the difficulty of earning a living at it. As far as I have been able to see no producing company has been able to apply ordinary business methods to the making of pictures. It is essentially an extravagant undertaking. A Director, if he is an artist, is always striving and groping after something which will express his ideas and which perhaps he himself would be unable to define. Even if he fails to achieve what he is aiming at he is always making shots at it—sometimes almost blind shots that make the commercial man shudder.

Many people in the profession are very thin-skinned as regards comment on their work, but unless they welcome informed criticism, I think they will lose the advantage of what I consider one of the most promising aspects of club life.

The Club with a Future

by COL. A. C. BROMHEAD, C.B.E.

It is not for me to try and tell the members how to run their own club, or to foresee all the benefits it can be made to bring them. But I would like to venture to point out one or two of the things which I think it is desirable to avoid.

One of the most useful virtues is that of minding one's own business, because in my view the film producing business is one that least of all will allow of outside interference, and any attempt to meddle with the affairs of individual concerns will only lead to disaster. It should therefore look entirely to the social side of things, and on the professional side, if members wish to expend their energies, they should devote them to the boosting and to increasing the prestige of the British picture.

The year 1922-3 is unquestionably going to be a big one for the British film, and if all producing interests pull together in the one direction of placing our home product in an unassailable position as sound and honest value for money.

The Club can do much to bring the British made film up to its correct proportion in our theatre programs. The proportion I estimate which our films should hold is approximately 50 per cent. I frankly admit that there are not at the moment enough good British films to supply 50 per cent. of the national programs, but it is up to the Club, by an earnest and steady endeavour, to encourage honest talent, and last, but not least, to eliminate the specious and the counterfeit which have from time to time administered serious blows to the whole trade.

Our Club will not help British production if it becomes a mutual admiration society. But if, accepting no man at his own valuation, it becomes a characteristic of the members that they not only encourage good work, but actually discourage the reverse, then another sound foundation stone will have been laid in the structure of the British film producing industry.

Cordial rivalry, honest competition, is the soul of progress. And friendly contact in the Club should be marked by no abatement of the competitive sense.

Let all remember that every good British picture helps every other good British picture; above all, let it never be forgotten that a bad British picture damns other British pictures.

A Club with a Function

by JEFFREY BERNERD.

The necessity and future function of this Club should be, in the first instance, to my mind, to breed good fellowship between the members thereof, who should all be interested or concerned in the manufacture of English productions. It should further be of great assistance to directors in the casting of their pictures.

It should be treated as a social club and a meeting-place for all those interested in the future of British pictures, and should have the arranging of social functions, which should be beneficial as a means of advertising British productions such as dances and other entertainments. But there are so many uses to which the Club could be put that it would take me too long to write them.

There is one point which the committee and members should keep in mind, and that is to avoid petty jealousies, which are very often the means of smashing a successful undertaking, and towards which the Film trade has a particular leaning.

If at any time I can be of any assistance to the Club, I shall be only too happy if they will command me.

PRESIDENTS AND ABOUT THE CLUB

A Club with a Purpose.

by J. STUART BLACKTON

Through a long experience I have generally found that co-operation brings about many constructive benefits. Most of my activities having been in the motion picture field, I know this to be particularly true in the case of film developments. When a number of minds get together and things are planned and put forward for general all-around helpfulness, the inevitable result is good for all concerned.

I am, therefore, keenly interested in the Kinema Club, because it is a forward movement of the various branches of the Kinema art and industry in England; and with such an ambitious program and altogether laudable purposes it is bound to achieve much for the British screen.

It stands to reason that when artistes, directors, art directors and representatives of all branches of the film art come together in such an organisation, many big things will be considered, the interchange of ideas will broaden the minds and immensely improve the conditions surrounding film production.

Forward together! That is a good slogan for the Club. Let every member enter into the spirit of co-operation and advancement. With such an organisation backed by this spirit, nothing can stop the progress of the plan so admirably set forward in the Club's program.

JEFFREY BERNERD

Entering the Industry through the M.P. Sales Agency, Jeffrey Bernerd was appointed hiring manager of Film Booking Offices upon the formation of that company, a post he resigned in April, 1918, to become managing director of the Stoll Film Co. He is also joint managing director to Stoll Picture Productions, Ltd. Address, 155, Oxford Street, W.1. (Kine Year Book, 1922.)

A. E. NEWBOULD, M.P.

One of the best-known figures in the Industry, A. E. Newbould was born in 1873, and was educated at Burton Grammar School. He is a director of Provincial Cinematograph Theatres, Ltd.; Associated Provincial Picture Houses, Ltd.; and the Ferrestone Press, Ltd. He served in the 1st Royal Dragoons from 1898 to 1903, gaining the Queen's and King's Medals and seven clasps for his services in the South African campaign against the Boers. From 1914 until March of last year he was President of the C.E.A. and many useful Trade movements were initiated during his term of office. In March, 1919, he was elected M.P. for the West Leyton division of Essex by a very large majority.

(Kine. Year Book, 1922.)

Col. BROMHEAD, C.B.E.

Mr. Bromhead started a branch of the Gaumont Company in London in 1898. He opened one of the first film studios in this country—at Loughborough Junction—and one of the first kinematograph theatres. He was one of the pioneers of the film hire service, and the originator of the "exclusive" film and "booking by contract." In 1911 he superintended the Indian Durbar pictures, and presented the first talking and singing pictures, Leon Gaumont's "Chronophone." Touring the world on behalf of the Gaumont Co., he opened subsidiary branches in Australia, Canada, Malta and New York. In 1912 he opened a factory at Shepherd's Bush, which supplied the great bulk of positive prints of American and other films for the British market. With M. Gaumont exhibited "Chronochrome" in 1913. Served with the "Queen's" 24th London Regiment during the war, attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Appointed to charge of special propaganda mission to Russia, he was decorated by the Tsar with the Order of St. Anne and Stanislaw. In May, 1918, he undertook a similar mission to the Italian front. J STUART BLACKTON

Born in Sheffield and was afterwards a newspaper reporter in America. One day Blackton was sent to interview Edison, who had just succeeded in projecting a moving picture on a screen. After investing in a projector, Blackton and Albert E. Smith built a studio, which was the beginning of the Vitagraph. He made the first film with a story in 1897, and took the first news film in 1898. Then followed a number of other films, and new studios were erected. Among some of his early productions were "Raffies," "A Tale of Two Cities," "The Life of Moses," "The Christian," "Treasure Island," "Othello," "Macbeth," "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "Salome," "Romeo and Juliet." After twenty-three years in America he returned to England, where he directed "The Glorious Adventure."

THIS NEW YEAR AND— — THIS NEW CLUB

by REX DAVIS

[The following article was written by Rex Davis for our New Year number, but we have held it over for this special issue.]

THE chimes and the carols will scarcely be over, and the shy new year barely begun, before the Club—our club—will have come in to claim its own. As a stranger we bid it welcome, for its coming will mean so much to us. Thank goodness the croak of the ill-omened "knocker" is almost silent now, and in his place there are many willing and distinguished hands to help navigate our little craft, that we may avoid the shoals and sandbanks, the shallows and rocks on which so many brave little ships have been wrecked. One is encouraged to believe that the consistent harmony that has existed in all the dealings of the Executive Committee will be a lubricant to the utmost endeavour for the welfare of the Club.

One cannot speak of the Club without reference to our fairy godfather, George Ridgwell, whose magnificent generosity has enabled us to start out with such a beautiful home; what we all owe to him no one can exaggerate. I wonder, in our profession, or indeed in any other, where anyone could be found prepared to advance a large sum of money without any security whatever, and with no prospect of any sort of financial advantage should the Club be the success that is anticipated. Mr. Ridgwell had one fixed idea: to do all he could for the welfare, the comradeship, the advancement of his brother and sister workers, and in Kipling's words, "he does not advertise."

To George Ridgwell, we, as the Executive Committee, have great pleasure in raising our hat. But to those who have kept up the parrot cry of "you never can"—to the knockers—to those who sacrificed the general commonwealth, because collectively we could not agree with their individual opinion—to those who have only offered destructive criticism—to those who because their scheme, or pet idea was not adopted, and therefore judged the Executive Committee to be bankrupt of idea, intellectually insolvent, and with the mental equipment of an idiot child—to those we have equal pleasure in raising our foot!

To two other fairy godfathers we, as a club, owe so much—Frank A. Tilley, of the Kinematograph Weekly, and Ernest Allighan, of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO. They have done a maximum of work with a minimum of talk about it, and a complete economy of complaint at the vast amount we have foisted on them. If "the smallest service merits thanks," what can we say to these gentlemen?

Here it is peculiarly necessary that it should be known what these godfathers have done for our kinema kid which cries out so lustily to prove its existence. We do hope you will all like the Club, and that it really will be a haven, somewhere one can take sanctuary when the environment of Wardour Street becomes too soul destroying for words. This is the first of our own formations, and if "tall oaks from little acorns grow," who knows in the future we may not—!

What do you think of this:

The Daily Mail, January 4, 1922, says:—"To pay its way a club with only 1,000 members and no entrance fee requires a £15 15s. subscription." And somehow I think that staggering utterance will not unduly disturb us, for we know you will be coherent, considerate, and unexacting at first, realising if Rome was not built in a day, neither was any club formed to run on oiled wheels from the start.

We know, too, that you will remember that less than six months ago we had no premises, no prospects, no members, and no money; we know also that you will agree that co-operation, cohesion, combination are to be the alliterative characteristics of the Kinema Club, but we know, above all, that you mean this to be a fellowship of players. Knowing all this, why should we be nervous, anxious, or disturbed—conscious, too, that there are 400 members already, and our doors are not yet opened.

HOW HAVE WE DONE WITHOUT IT?

by CYRIL PERCIVAL

I.

WHEN you're waiting in the West End,
Which is known as London's best end,
With nowt to do till half-past two,
An agent then desiring you
To call, and see a pro-ducer,
Who may (or not) with you confer—
What can you do? Ah! here's the rub—
You used to wait inside a pub,
But now, thank heaven! there's the club—
How have we done without it?

II.

WHEN meeting someone urgently
For business chat, and cup of tea,
In secrecy you walk and walk,
And, at the same time, talk and talk.
The restaurants are full of noise,
Quiet tea-rooms crowded with the "boys."
What can you do? Ah, here's the rub—
For closed, at this time, is your pub—
But now, thank heaven! there's the club,
How have we done without it?

III.

YOU have some friends who entertain,
And invitations on you rain;
Perhaps your domicile cannot Return the favours on the spot;
You think of dinners—theatres, too—
Which means so much expense to you.
What can you do? Ah! here's the rub—
You cannot take him to your pub,
But now, thank heaven! there's the club.
How have we done without it?

IV.

TO those who wish to "wait and see,"
Before they join—I send this plea:
If all had waited, there would be No club for those who "wait" to "see."
Appreciation they should show
Of Ridgwell, Allighan and Co.
What should they do? Just pay their sub.,
And cut out that confounded pub,
They'll say, when they do see the club,
How have we done without it?

THE FILM ARTISTES' WORST ENEMY

Film artistes have much to contend with in their weary tramp along the pathway to stardom; the question that we have set some representative artistes is: "Who or What is the Worst Enemy?" And we intend to publish their replies in this and subsequent issues. In the meantime others are invited to contribute their opinion.

by JOHN STUART

The screen artiste has many handicaps to survive, and one or two enemies to encounter, but his worst—well, let me tell you.

His worst enemy watches with a lynx eye and distorts every expression and everything he does. Is he trying to appear sentimental and lover-like? His enemy can only discover a blurry smile and a curious uncertainty about his figure, for which nature is not responsible; only his worst enemy can reveal this horrid thing. Has he beautiful crisp hair of chestnut brown? No matter, to his enemy it is merely a dark mat of combed wool. Are his eyes childlike and bland and his cheekbones normal as cheekbones go? His watchful enemy records the first as devoid of expression as the cod's optic, whilst the last look higher than even Bonnie Scotland could hope to produce.

Oh! this enemy of ours, there is no circumventing him. He is even more cruel to the ladies than to the sterner sex, so they tell me. Frocks of velvet look like cretonne, real sables like catskin, a peach complexion like the covering of a star-fisk, and golden hair like "nothing on earth," to quote one who has it. All this I am told by disappointed fair ones. February Fair says no one will believe she has flaxen curls; her worst enemy is always making them out to be black!

"Name! Name!"

Yes, name the dark demon who causes so much heart-burning. It is one who in the general opinion cannot lie—the camera.

When that "cannot lie" tradition was hatched, kinema cameras were not—the bad kinema camera can lie like—like only a bad kinema camera can.

And yet shall all the blame be loaded upon the one-eyed camera? Usually a two-eyed expert has something to do with the dread things the camera records. Let his New Year resolution be something like this:—

"Dear Stars,—

I look to my lenses,
And focus them true,
To save many frenzies,
And cusses from you."

All who have suffered from poor photography will tell you that they would sooner suffer from poor man's gout, poor circulation, or toothache; in truth, poor photography sets up a real ache, heartache in the case of the ladies, of course; and an ache below the belt with common people like me.

COME RIGHT IN!

If you are passing, or if you want to ask a question, or if you have some news, or if you want to have a chat over the business—come right in! We are anxious to maintain close personal touch with all our readers. We are putting you first all the time—you and your interests are our chief concern, and we want to emphasise that you have a perfect right to come in and regard our time as being at your disposal. Come right in!

REALISING THE IDEA

The Honorary General Secretary Reviews the Progress

Those of you who have had little or nothing to do with the origin of the Club may not know of all the hard work and laborious hours that it has involved, but you may be in a better position to judge of the whole enterprise than we who have been actively engaged in the task of commencing such an institute. Perhaps we are too close to the picture to get an adequate view of it. However, the task is now accomplished, the many futile attempts that have been made in the past to form a Club will now be forgotten in the fact that what we set out to do we have succeeded in doing. A record of the short history attached to the commencement of the Club may not be inappropriate, although the recounting of it will be an embarrassing job for the writer as it will involve a distasteful use of the first personal pronoun.

Six months ago, soon after the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO was started, I became aware of the great need for a social centre for this ever-increasing profession. It seemed totally wrong in principle that the members of an artistic profession such as this should have to meet for social intercourse in public places, and did not contribute either to the dignity of the person or of the profession. I claim no distinction in discovering that a Club was necessary—necessary as much for the entertainment of those engaged in the motion picture industry as for the industry itself. It was apparent that one of the reasons that America had smiled at the British motion picture industry and the stage had sneered at it, was that the profession had not had the opportunity of establishing its status or preserving its dignity.

And as others had made futile attempts and as we conceived the Studio to be the mouthpiece of those engaged in the production of British motion pictures, I became convinced that it was the duty of this journal to do all that was possible to ensure the formation of a Club.

At first the idea received more than its due share of cold water. Strange to say, those who later became the most interested were at first the least encouraging. George Ridgwell chuckles now as he recalls how he 'phoned me when I first mooted the idea in these columns, and explained, with the American screen club as an illustration, how there were so many odds against it. And there was the experience of the distributing side of the business to prove that film clubs are easier to talk about than to realise.

But I was given an entirely free hand to develop the Club idea in the Studio. In a few weeks I had felt the pulse of the profession on the matter; letters that came to this journal and conversations I had with representative members of the profession strengthened me in my determination to go forward with the scheme. The Kinematograph Weekly supported the Studio in this matter, and Frank A. Tilley himself signed the letters of invitation that I sent out to various people to an informal pow-wow over the idea.

This gathering was held at the editorial office of this journal under the presidency of Mr. Tilley, and it was then decided, as the meeting was not convinced of its own representative character, to call another meeting at which more and other people were invited. At this second meeting about 50 were present. The scheme was discussed and approved and those present balloted for a Formation Committee.

This Committee met many times at these genially and yet so capably presided. The Club owes much to that meeting, for it was the sign of the nebulous becoming concrete and Colonel Bromhead's interest and support contributed considerably to our present position.

With the assistance of five ladies we went on with our plans but always with the disheartening thought that the procuring of premises would be the supreme stumbling block. I remember how half-a-dozen of us spent a cold Saturday morning tramping up dirty stairs in various buildings—hunting for premises! That ought to have damped the ardour of that Committee of Enthusiasts; but it did not.

One morning I was called on the telephone to hear George Ridgwell's excited voice: he had seen from his flat the military moving out of the premises opposite. Ten minutes later I had joined him and together we interviewed the trustees.

After many consultations and considerable difficulty we obtained from them an unenthusiastic acquiescence. But we had, at most, about £200 in the funds and the rent and rates totalled about £1,000. It was then that George Ridgwell brought the Club idea into the realm of practical politics when he informed me that he would advance to the Club the money necessary to cover the first year's rent and rates. If it had not been for this generous offer, the chances are that we should still be tramping up dirty stairs in various buildings—hunting for premises.

Now followed a trying period attending to legal points with the Hon. Solicitor, Graham Davis (the father of Rex Davis), to whom the Club owes much; his legal advice and assistance has been invaluable. Then, for a month, I spent many hours arranging the thousand-and-one details connected with the decoration of the building, furnishing, attending to the victualling, catering, staffing and installing billiard table, gas fires, stoves, etc., to say nothing of the voluminous secretarial work.

To-morrow will see the consummation of our efforts. The Club will be opened. Of course, I rejoice; but not merely because I am gratified at the realisation of the idea that I originated, but because we in this office are able, more than any others, to estimate the great beneficial effect that the Club is going to have on the future of the profession and the whole motion picture industry. There is no Club like ours in the world. There must be no pictures to compare with ours in the world.

offices, and here I must break off to pay a tribute to the members of this Committee, who worked very hard, into the late hours of the night, on an idea that was, at the best, only nebulous, and at worst a doubtful proposition. Fortunately, that was a Committee of enthusiasts who had faith in the idea. Their names are:—

Rex Davis, Eille Norwood, Duncan McRae, Arthur Walcott, Bertram Burleigh, Sydney Paxton, Fred Paul, George Ridgwell, Adrian Brunel, George Woods Taylor, with Mr. Tilley as chairman and myself as secretary.

Those weeks were weeks of surmounting obstacles. And it speaks well for the whole-heartedness of that Committee that never once did a discussion become acrimonious. There was always a readiness to give-and-take for the good of the idea. Of course, there were differences of opinion. One member resigned for a certain principle and we all admired him for his honesty in so doing. Then there were the problems of the Qualifications for Membership. But with it all there was this enthusiasm for the idea.

In sublime faith we called a Mass Meeting at the Court Picture Playhouse, over which Colonel A. C. Bromhead so Much has been written about the status of the cameraman. Should he be the obedient servant of the director or should he have a say in the production of the pictures? If we are going to have good British pictures the importance of the cameraman will have to be realised. Many firms acknowledge the importance of the man behind the camera; they are mostly very big, well-established firms. The smaller ones are usually unfortunate enough to possess the "world's-greatest-director" type of man who can tell the cameraman a lot he never knew about photography and a lot he never wants to know about it. Then there is the firm that is frightened to allow the cameraman to be of too much importance—he might think too much of himself and he might want more money—therefore, he is kept under; kept in his place, where all cameramen should be, and the director is allowed to decide what kind of shot, what angle, what lighting. As for the finished result—well, suffice to say that is usually very very painful. On the other hand, if the cameraman is consulted before the production and is given a script to study, he can go carefully through it, get the idea of the story, make notes as to the lighting of the shot, and when the time comes for filming he knows what he wants and saves a great deal of time. A director, with any common-sense, will wait until his cameraman is ready to "shoot," for it is the cameraman who can make or mar a production. Things are looking better for the cameraman, but there are still a great number of people who look upon him as a mechanic. So long as such a state of affairs is in existence the cameraman cannot come into his own. The most amazing part of it all, however, is the producing firms' inability to see the enormous amount of harm they are doing not only themselves, but the Industry, in adopting this policy.

THEIR RELATIVE POSITIONS

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

The Society is to have a dinner after all, but it will be about April when the affair takes place. The suggestion that the dinner should coincide with the arrival of the secretary back in England, was one that was received in a favourable manner by all members at the annual general meeting.

Arrangements are being made for a special evening to be held periodically at the Society's headquarters. The President is trying to arrange a special Pathé evening, when it will be the duty of Pathé's cameramen, who are members of the K.C.S., to entertain the other members of the Society. This will be followed by a number of other such affairs, all to be held by members of various firms represented in the K.C.S.

It has been suggested that the Society should hold an exhibition of the work of the Society's members. Topical men would exhibit scenes from one of their biggest seeps, and studio men would exhibit scenes from their best photographic shot. The idea is good; it now remains to be seen what will be done in the matter.

Since the annual general meeting the Society seems to have taken a new lease of life. Many members turned up at that meeting and seemed to be quite enthusiastic about the work of the Society again. Let us hope that henceforth the meetings will be better attended.

George Woods-Taylor, the secretary, should soon be back in England. He is having quite a good time in India, and speaks particularly well of the food that he is receiving. From what I can gather, Taylor has been getting better photographic results than some of the cameramen who have spent most of their time filming in the Indian climate.

EVENT OF THE WEEK

If the exploits of our cameramen were recorded week by week, in time there would be enough material to fill a few volumes. Each week topical cameramen are on some new stunt, and studio men are asked to do seemingly impossible things and get over all kinds of obstacles. I intend to record each week one of the big camera events of the week; I am sure that it will make interesting reading, and that the record of a really important event, either studio or topical, will serve both to interest and to inspire the healthy rivalry which is all to the good of the profession.

The event of this past week, from the topical point of view, was the filming of the Cook v. Carpentier fight, by the Pathé cameramen, Frank Bassill, Joe Gimmell, Leslie Wyland, A. Starmer, C. Cotter and Kenneth Gordon.

Starmer and Gordon were turning when the knockout was secured. The film came in for a lot of publicity in the lay Press, for it demonstrated that Carpentier did not foul Cook in the knockout.

One of the biggest obstacles a cameraman is up against on stunts such as these is the smoke which accumulates in the hall. I have heard a number of suggestions of how to get rid of smoke on occasions like this, but none of them are practicable. A wet sheet draws some of the smoke away, but I cannot imagine a crowd of cameramen turning up at a fight, complete with wet sheet, etc.

Still, even with a hall full of smoke, the Pathé cameramen have secured a film which gives very little cause for complaints. Cook and Carpentier viewed the film last Saturday at Pathé's private theatre.

Incidentally, the film, as I have already hinted, established the accuracy of kine-camera work by forever silencing the criticism that centred upon Carpentier's last punch, which was claimed by many to be a foul.—"TRIPOD."

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

Topical Budget is still forging ahead with its "Potted Sunshine," and, according to Charlie Heath, a new mixture has just been given a try-out, which gives far better results than anything previously attempted. This new light, I am given to understand, gives a violet light instead of a yellow one, and burns longer than the old powder that Topical has been using.

It is interesting to note that Bert Ford was responsible for the filming of the English version of "Disraeli," which Percy Nash directed some years ago. The American version has just been released, and it will be interesting to compare the photography.

Henry Saunders is back from America, where he has been filming the Washington Conference for Pathé Frères. Incidentally he has also had an opportunity of studying the methods of the Topical man in America, and has come to the conclusion that we are quite equal to them in every way.

In America, cameramen are treated by the Government in a far better manner than they are here. Each month a pass is issued by the police, which admits the cameraman to any place. Here, it is a struggle to get a pass for one day.

Fisher and Gordon, of Pathé, were down at the Holland Park Rink the other night filming the skating, with the help of the sunlight arcs.

Efforts are being made, I understand, for Kenneth Gordon, the Pathé cameraman, to film the scenes of the opening ceremony of the Club to-morrow, for inclusion in Eve's Pictorial. And he should be able to get some excellent shots.

SONGS ON KINE SUBJECTS

by HUGH E. WRIGHT.

6.—“CUT!”

Cut! Cut! Cut!
Mangle it, slash it, and hack it!
But me no “butting,”
Get on with the cutting,
Way! for the Butchers who back it!

I.

I ONCE wrote a wonderful film, sir,
Wrote and produced it what's more.
The settings were lavish—exteriors ravishing, just what the public adore.
The story was strong and yet simple,
Passionate, human, intense;
I put my heart in it—all of my Art in it (Somebody else put the pence).

II.

CAMERAMAN was a dream, sir;
Echoed my every whim.
Oh! but the lighting—was such to delight in!
I take my hat off to him.
Star had a temperament, too, sir,
Acting the finest I've seen;
For in each gesture she somehow expressed your Idea of a tragedy queen.

III.

THE man who provided the money,
I think was a butcher by trade.
“H'art! Never 'eard of it! Dunno a word of it!”
(This is how pictures are made.)
Cut the beginning and ending,
Hacked at the middle and side,
Slashed at the titles, and stabbed at it vitals
(He was the boss), so it died.

IV.

ALL the most beautiful moments
Wildly he nipped in the bud.
Used the projecting-room as a dissectingroom,
Pouring a “negative” flood
Into the “positive” waste-bin.
(God! I could murder the lout!)

Cut out the sequence and started a leak whenee
The guts of the picture ran out.
* * *
And now I'm out of a job,
And damned to perpetuity,
To regions infernal; for every Trade journal
Blamed ME for the continuity.

THE ART OF SCREEN WRITING

VI.—"Making Up" and Placing Photo Plays

by GERTRUDE M. ALLEN

If you have any knowledge whatsoever of editors—good, bad or just human ones—you will know that they, like most people who matter, have a "kink" for beautiful things.

If your story shows the faintest possible glimmer of being useful it will get read, no matter in what form you submit it. But, if it goes on its mission of hope clad in clean white raiment, typed in clear, readable print, and folded so that the first and last pages are identifiable without a tour of discovery, it will stand a better chance of being read—and read right through—before twenty or thirty other manuscripts which are not so visually inviting.

I am not advocating the use of pale pink bows, or gold-tipped paper-piercers in the "make-up" of your scenario. You will

(4) The "continuity"—being the different scenes to be played, each numbered consecutively, and separated from each other by a goodly space so that anyone may be referred to easily.

As I intimated in a previous article of this series, it is well to study the products of the different producing companies before submitting a scenario to any particular one. The result of this study will be that you will know, more or less, whether your story will appeal to that company or not. But this precaution will not absolve you from "The Editor's regrets." The scenario editor spends most of his waking hours indulging in morbid regrets—all more or less profound—he's paid to do it. If he didn't have any "regrets" he wouldn't get his salary! Therefore, though you cloak your manuscript with optimism, and send it on tour accompanied by fervent prayers for its welfare, it will most probably, like the prodigal son, come back to its loving parent.

This does not essentially signify that your scenario is a bad or impossible one. The editorial personnel of the film-world is like a mixed salad—there's a bit of everything. So that, although your first attempt may draw one more from the inexhaustible stock of regrets of one editor, there yet remains a possibility of it evincing a throb of interest in the soul of another. So try again.

Underneath the romantic rise to fame of scores of world-popular authors and dramatists, there has lurked that first, that almost inevitable, tragedy of the rejected manuscript.

Several fingers are dipped into the picture-play pie, and it may be that your scenario has been "turned down," not because of its utter worthlessness, but because the director, or the leading man, or the leading lady, or the cameraman—any one, indeed, of the several people who are intimately concerned with the production of a film—has expressed some personal doubt about its adaptability, and a consequent query has been raised in the minds of all. Producing concerns cannot afford to take risks, or make experiments. A film costs a lot of money to make, and unless the appeal of the story is certain—unless, as far as it is humanly possible to judge, it is going to make a good and saleable picture, that story will be rejected as the safest means of avoiding a catastrophe.

One gentle injunction. Enclose return postage in the parcel containing your script. It is a courtesy you owe to those who have to deal with it, and, after all, an editor does not expect to pay for what he may consider to be your indiscretion! If all those stamps you send are not needed—if you sell your manuscript right away—you still cannot view it as extravagance, for you may soon be able to "buy up" that "just human" editor whom you were lucky enough to find as a target for your first shot!

(Next week: "Rates of Remuneration.")

YOU AND YOUR CLUB

You have congratulated us on the result of our work.

You have admired the Club and are grateful for its existence

Will you please keep well in the front of your brain box the fact that it is your Club?

Will you therefore support your own business as far as you possibly can—if not farther!

HAVE your lunch, tea or dinner at the Club

HAVE your drinks at the Club.

PLAY billiards, cards or other games at the Club.

AND—of course—pay your dues and subscriptions promptly. If you have not paid this year's subscription, please see the Secretary at once

Do not fail to remember that until the picture production is sold there will be a difficult financial period to be negotiated—do everything that is possible to assist the Club through this period.

write "Hopeful Amateur" all over the thing in blatant letters if you indulge in this sort of extravagance—no real author could afford such decorative adjuncts! But the thought and care that goes to the creation of your work must be reflected in its evolution, if you would appeal to the scenario editor's inevitable "kink."

The different sections of a complete scenario, "in order of their appearance," are as follows:—

(1) The title-sheet, bearing the title of your story, your name and your address. (If it does not bear your name and address it stands a good chance of receding into the "things that were"—for your covering letter will probably get detached from it immediately on its arrival.)

(2) A short, concise, and explanatory synopsis of the story (two thousand words will usually give the necessary outline of the action).

(3) A complete cast of the characters, from the principals to the small parts, with a note of the "extras" at the end—such as "A crowd of villagers," "Dancers for a ball-room scene," etc.

MY MESSAGE TO THE CLUB

"As one so closely allied to the British Film Industry, may I be allowed to express my good wishes for the future of the Kinema Club. I think the scheme an excellent one, and trust that it will meet with the success which it deserves. Will you accept the sincere wishes of myself and those members of the British Industry now resident in the 'town of tulips.' We are an Anglo-Dutch concern, and the Dutch as well as the Anglo join me in these sentiments."—MAURICE H. BINGER, managing director, Hollandia Film Studios, Haarlem Holland.

* * *

"My message to the Club is 'May it prosper as I am sure the Kinema Industry will.'"—SIR J. D. REES, Bt., K.C.I.E.

* * *

"In wishing the new Kinema Club the fullest measure of success, I welcome most cordially the endeavour to bring those engaged on the Production side of our great Industry together in amity and social intercourse. My message to the Club is:—'Keep your membership as exclusive as it is possible to make it without doing any injustice to any worthy worker at the studios; and also keep to the social side, to the rigid exclusion of film politics and Trade controversies.'"—SAM HARDY.

* * *

"Being a subscriber of your very entertaining publication, I have noticed with interest the formation of the new Kinema Club and I wish to take this opportunity of expressing my heartiest congratulations to every one concerned. Please allow me to convey to yourselves, your subscribers and the members of the Kinema Club all happiness and prosperity for the New Year.—TOM TERRISS (Cosmopolitan Productions, New York).

* * *

"Sincere wishes for the success of the Kinema Club. May it be the means of bringing together in a friendly spirit all concerned in British Productions, so that the best results and the unanimous approval of the world's public be obtained."—A. G. GRANGER.

* * *

"I join with every one else in wishing the Club every success and prosperity."—SIR WILLIAM JURY.

"Every one whose heart and interest lies in the work of creating or producing motion pictures; every director, artiste, writer or artisan whose effort assists in up-building the tremendous influence of the screen, should feel it a matter of personal pride and loyal duty to support the new Kinema Club and make of it an enduring monument to British Screenedom and a credit to all the members of Screencraft. All success to the Club, and congratulations to its officers and organisers."—J. STUART BLACKTON.

"I am glad to hear that the Kinema Club is progressing so favourably and shall indeed be glad to be allowed to become a member of this body. The Club will, in my opinion, do a great deal to promote and further the existing friendship in connection with producing organisations in this country, and as it becomes more and more an established fact, will, I trust, eventually lead to that close union of friendship which exists throughout the Studios in Hollywood, California. On my recent visit to California, it was most apparent to me that, although the studios there were working in competition with each other, the spirit of friendship and help which one company was willing to give to the other stood out to a marked degree. I would like at this stage to wish the Club, its President and members, every success and good wishes for 1922."—CHAS. H. BELL, MAJOR.

"I would like to send a message of goodwill to the Kinema Club, which, apart from its obviously useful purpose in England, should prove a link for those members of the British Industry who spend most of their time abroad. It is an excellent method of keeping in touch with business confrères and friends, and should equally broaden the scope of the club which would eventually be represented in various countries. May all success attend your efforts."—ELSIE COMEN (the First Foreign Member).

HOW ARTISTES SPOIL THEMSELVES

by MAX ROMA

The above subject is truly a very difficult and a complex one, full of pitfalls, and is, of course, always a matter of opinion, but an interesting subject to me. While I feel that a much abler pen than mine could have dealt with it and done it better justice, I should like to say what I consider, in my humble opinion, are a few of the main faults or errors of judgment some artistes commit, to their own personal detriment, in dealing with agents.

There is, first of all, the man who barges into one's private office as if he owned the place (even if one is engaged) and will stand and listen to all one is saying either to another client or on the 'phone. He stays an interminable time, and is generally too thick-skinned to take a polite hint.

He is quite satisfied that, as he has nothing to do, you must be in the same boat. He thinks you like to listen to his wonderful career, little dreaming that you are dying to end it for him.

Next, in order of merit, comes the lady of uncertain age, who wastes time insisting on showing you stacks of photos and out-of-date stills. You inform her gently, but firmly, that you are busy, but she insists that she will not keep you a minute, but with the slightest encouragement she will, like Tennyson's "Brook," go on for ever.

Others, and I really think these are the most disliked people who visit agents, are those one sends to a certain studio for work where they promptly make it their business to ingratiate themselves with the powers that be, get sent for direct by the studio, and then conveniently forget that it was due to the agent's original introduction that they secured the work, and feel hurt when he quietly suggests that some commission is due to him.

One other kind of person not very popular with agents are those who insist on telling you all their private and domestic affairs. These are sometimes very pathetic, and I mention it more in sorrow than in anger, for some of the things one has to listen to would make the most hardened of us feel pity for them.

At the same time, an agent must not allow himself to be swayed either by pity or spite when finding his people or types, or he would very soon find himself out of business.

Other artistes give one wrong particulars as to their experience, but this is generally very soon found out. Others (especially tall ladies) give their wrong height. Others, again, leave photographs, which are truly beautiful, but which only bear a slight resemblance to the original, thereby injuring themselves more than they know, for if they are sent for on the strength of their photographs they are turned down because they are not a bit like it.

Then, of course, there is always the 'artiste who becomes abusive and insolent because he or she (generally he) has been given no work for so many weeks or months, and who apparently claims it as a right that he should be given work. Of course, they do not always say so in so many words, but they convey it subconsciously by their whole manner and attitude.

The artistes who will go a long way are undoubtedly those who, apart from their ability, are pushful and plucky, look cheerful under all conditions, take "No" for an answer, and make themselves scarce when their type is not required.

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

Hugh E. Wright, in addition to his recognised histrionic ability, is a skilled wielder of the pen. By the courtesy of the Actor we are able to reproduce, in serial form, one of Hugh's literary effusions.

CHAPTER V.

"Are you fond of watches?" said the old man, pulling an enormous watch from his waistcoat pocket. "Now, here's a watch! It's entirely my own invention."

Alice looked at it; it seemed quite ordinary, save that the figures I., V. and VIII. were not on the dial. Alice pointed this out to him.

"Exactly!" he said proudly. "Now, on your watch, when it's one o'clock it's time for lunch, isn't it?"

Alice nodded in agreement.

"There you are!" he cried. "Now, on my watch it's never one o'clock, so it's never time for lunch, you see! And the same with tea and dinner time."

"But isn't that rather awkward?" asked Alice.

"Not when you haven't anything to eat," he answered.

"But you get awfully hungry, don't you?" said Alice.

"I know." He shook his head peevishly, and looked at the watch again. "I can't understand that. But, after all, that's not the watch's fault. It's a splendid invention; one of my best. . . . But one does get hungry. It's that difficulty about eating, you know. . . . Would you mind if I recited it to you?"

"I should love it," said Alice, quickly.

"Would you?" asked the old man, doubtfully. "It's rather a sad bit. Its name is: 'The Ghosts of 1880.'"

"Oh, that's what you call it," said Alice.

"You mustn't say that's what I call it," said the old man, hurriedly. "That would get me into trouble with a lot of people. I call it: 'Beside my Office Door.'"

"Oh, that's what it's called," she said again.

"No!" he replied, sadly. "No! Really, it's called: 'The Greatest of These.' I'll begin, if I may."

Alice nodded, and he started in a low, clear voice:—

I'll tell you everything I can,
I'll tell you even more;
I met an aged, aged man
Beside my Office door.
His brow was sad, that ancient lad,
His boots were like a sieve.
"Come tell me what you do," I cried.
"And how it is you live?"

"I only ask for work," he said.

"I do not wish to boast,

But I have need of daily bread.

The 1880 Ghost

Was laid, you know, some time ago.

I would not beg a crust

I only ask a living wage,

My Union says I must."

But I was thinking of a plan,

For making people talk,

By cutting Shakespeare into bits,

And selling him as pork;

And thus to save all Authors' fees,

And get a name for pluck:—

"Come tell me how you live," I cried.

"When you have any luck."

He said: "I stand on Agents' stairs,
And haunt the Studios;
I sometimes pawn my pants for pence,
Or borrow bobs from 'Pros.'"

Yet once"—he sighed—"the critics said
My Romeo was great.
If you want anyone for crowds
My terms I'll gladly state."

But I was thinking of a scheme

To make the critics start,

By playing "Lear" in holland "tabs,"

And calling it Dutch Art.

I'd thus out-Granville Barker,

And save Cash:—And so I cried:

"Come tell me how you live, old man?"

"I don't!" he said—and died!

And now, whenever I hear a youth

Who's holding forth at length,

That Charity is dead at last,

For Union is strength.

Or when I read an article

On "Ghosts of days of yore";

I think of him I used to know,

Whose eye was dim, whose speech was slow,

Who waited, weary, full of woe,

For work he really needed so,

Who had been great as Romeo,

And now, because he needed "dough,"

Would wave a banner to and fro,

With thirty others in a row,

Who died—because he had to go

From this old world to one below,

Where coals are cheaper far, I know,

Than at my Office door.

There was a long pause when the old Actor had finished.

"I don't know exactly why," said Alice at last. "But it seems to me so dreadfully sad I want to cry."

"That's the worst of nonsense with a little truth in it. The sad bits creep in," he said.

"And did he really die?" she asked.

"Oh, yes; he died," said the old Actor.

"You mustn't blame him, though; it was that difficulty about eating again, you know," he added vaguely. "Besides, I hadn't invented my watch then!"

"But I suppose the Actors' Union paid all the expenses of the funeral, and gave his widow something," said Alice, hopefully.

The old man hesitated. "Oh, the Union buried him," he said at last.

"The Actors' Union?" asked Alice.

"No; just the Union," he answered with a sigh.

"You aren't criticising the Actors' Union, are you?" said Alice, who was getting a little frightened at the seriousness of things.

"Oh, it was just—perfectly just!" The old man hesitated again. "You're very young, aren't you, my dear?" he added, after a pause. "One of these days you'll realise that there is nothing so utterly unfair as the absolutely just! You know what the three big things in Life are, don't you?"

"I'm not sure—," began Alice.

"Why, Faith, Hope and Charity!" he interrupted. "And the greatest of these is Charity! The Man who used those words founded the first Union," he added gravely.

"Did they fight for a Minimum Wage?" asked Alice.

"Of course!" said the old man. "Didn't He say: 'The labourer is worthy of his hire'?" But He believed in a maximum of work, too. Some of our Unions seem to forget that."

"And did they go on strike?" asked Alice again.

"He was always striking against injustice. You remember that bit in the Temple?"

IS THE CENTRE OF GRAVITY SHIFTING?

by WYNDHAM STANDING

Why do I think that Europe is destined not in the early, but in the immediate future, to become the headquarters of film productions?

There are many reasons, of which I can only pretend to give the more obvious few that occur to me. There are, of course, mechanical considerations here in Europe as everywhere else in the world, but, of these the first is the gift of the clearest daylight, fortunately as widely available in parts of Europe as among the big open spaces of California.

And then to consider the scenic possibilities of those European countries which most readily occur. The time has arrived for a greater catholicity of outlook, beyond even the peculiarly favourable conditions which, in California and elsewhere, have made the American Film Industry the stupendous enterprise it is, and given it an undoubted advantage which only the scenic heritage of Europe that I am about to indicate could ever hope to equal.

It is said: Unhappy is the country that has no history; in Europe history lies six feet deep, and romance—the spirit of the film—is inextricably interwoven with history.

In Europe, the point, after all, seems to me that the detail and the mise-en-scène of every conceivable human story lies ready to hand and true to nature; in fact, it is nature itself. That is why the greater home of the film must necessarily lie in Europe as the cradle of the oldest civilisation. Pantomime, the oldest expression of the art of acting in the world, is now the newest, with avenues opening out before it of which even Shakespeare never dreamt.

It is my conviction that the day is not far distant when pictures will be made in the exact locale in which the author has written the story. The "lath and plaster, papier-mâché, movie village" will be consigned to the limbo of a forgotten past.

MUSIC AND THE ARTISTE

by EDWARD D. ROBERTS

IT is an indisputable fact that the true artiste is emotional, and, as music plays on the emotions, it may be taken for granted that he is inspired by it.

In the British studio the atmosphere and surroundings are not always congenial to a temperamental artiste. The cameraman shouts instructions to the electricians; the director, more often than not, shouts at his artistes; the carpenters bang and whistle (which is calculated to show the stage manager they really are working!), and the arcs and Westminsters hiss like so many disgruntled rattlesnakes.

And then—on goes the artiste to enact an emotional scene which teams with sobstuff! Even then the shooting is frequently punctuated with a growl from the direction of the directorial stool.

On the other hand, we will assume that the director, well knowing his artiste to be emotional, has engaged a few musicians, who are carefully obscured behind the "set."

Very well. The 'script demands that the artiste has to reflect on the error of his "naughty" ways: his manly frame shakes with emotion—he chokes, tears well in his eyes—he staggers into a chair and buries his face in his hands.

Would not the strains of Schumann's "Nachtstück" or something equally pathetic help him on his way a bit?

Several American companies have adopted this method of extracting every ounce of emotion from their artistes with success; and I believe that Eddie Polo actually takes a "fold-up" harmonium with him on exteriors!

When Sir John Martin-Harvey was playing in the film version of "The Broken Melody" down at Elstree the melody was played continuously during the shooting of the very heavy interiors.

Now, what is your opinion?

"STAR WORSHIP"

TWO LETTERS ON LAST WEEK'S "FOCUS"

by PATRICK L. MANNOCK

(Hepworth)

You declare editorially, in reference to Stewart Rome's well-known view, that writing stories for stars is wrong in principle. Why? No one hates abject star-worship more than I do, but

- (1) Are there no deservedly great popular screen artistes?
- (2) Don't we all like seeing these personalities in suitable stories, and isn't it as rough on them as it is on us when they don't get them?
- (3) Isn't it heartbreaking for scenario departments to scour fiction and drama to fit exactly a valuable personality?
- (4) Haven't some of the greatest plays been written for stage actors?
- (5) Are there not many stories which could never be done justice to except by superb interpretations of character by exceptional people who are actually completing the author's work?

The answer to all the above questions, I assert, is "Yes."

I believe strongly in photoplays without stars; but I also want to see clever and attractive personalities (there are not too many of them) provided with the most suitable material from those best qualified to furnish it.

by BROOKSBANK WALTON

(Artiste)

I read with considerable interest your paragraphs dealing with this subject, and fully agree with the purport thereof, and I have no doubt that there are many really experienced and accomplished members of the profession who will be pleased to learn that the "single-star" tradition is on the wane.

In support of your suggestion of "All-good Casts," might I offer as an example the tremendous success and constant revivals of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas. It is generally admitted that the secret of their popularity is due largely to the fact that each, with its eight or ten good, and more or less equal, parts, all invariably well cast, are more entertaining than the constant entrance and exit of the same two over-worked stars in the more recent musical comedies.

I had the pleasure of seeing a film this week (American, of course) illustrative of this more equitable casting method, and, furthermore, if taken in conjunction with its companion film in the same program, the two offer a striking example which amply justifies the criticisms of the "fair-minded crowd" referred to in M. Montagu's letter—"What U.S. Thinks of Us."

The two films I refer to are respectively "While New York Sleeps" and "The Great Day." The former is composed of three distinct episodes, each dealing with a vastly different phase of New York night life. There were four practically equal parts in each episode, and same four artistes—more or less unknown to the British picturegoer—each rendered a most versatile and enthralling performance throughout.

Then, after this, I sat through the typical "All theatre star cast" British film, in which the parts had all obviously been cast according to the various self-advertised stage artistes' ability to attract box-office returns, and so, of course, the result, in my humble opinion, was "hopelessly unsuitable types," "insipid acting," "lack of pep," and "upper classes uncouthly portrayed," in fact, nearly everything our American confreres accuse us of.

Now there is no denying the fact that the British film producing companies have at their disposal, and in every branch of the profession, the most resourceful and best brains, talent and material in the world, but until ability, suitability and experience are recognised and utilised in preference to the prevailing "star worship," then we must accept such home truths as those contained in the criticisms of the "fair-minded American crowd" with as good grace as possible.

THE K.C.S. AS A TRADE UNION

George Woods-Taylor replies to M. P. Prout's article, "Trade Union No. 1796," in our December 3 issue. Mr. Woods-Taylor is at present in India, therefore the delay.

"As one of the group that helped to form the K.C.S. in 1918, I may say that at that time there was no idea of forming the society into a Trade Union. As a matter of fact several members resigned in the early days because it was not a Trade Union.

The Society had been in existence well over a year before a resolution put at a general meeting decided in favour of forming it into a Trade Union. This was partly done for self-protection. We had to be first in the field, otherwise a composite society would have been registered, and again, under the Friendly Society Act, the safeguard of the finance of the society is assured to its members.

Several would-be cameramen think they have a grievance against the K.C.S., and that this society prevents them becoming Knights of the Handle. Nothing of the sort; the society's rules provide for probationary members who have spent two years in cinematograph dark-rooms.

Does any society—medical, law, architects, journalists, etc.—teach members their profession or admit them until fully qualified? No! They have to go through a preliminary training as student, apprentice or articulated clerk with some firm, and if they qualify at their exams. they are admitted as members of the society.

When I left England last October a good many of our members had been out of a berth for months. Would it be fair to them to take in student members, teach them their craft, and have them to compete against in any vacancy that might occur?

There is no idea of boycott as far as the K.C.S. is concerned to anyone who "makes good." I have several friends who are absolutely first-class cameramen, but are not, I regret to say, members of the K.C.S. Still, I am sure all members of the society appreciate the high-class work they turn out.

Rodier Heath has got to start at the bottom of the ladder, and not expect an elevator to get him to the top rung in the minimum of time."

DARK ROOM DEFECTS

by KENNETH GORDON

At the meetings of the K.C.S. the laboratory work has been proved to be the main stumbling block to British photographic quality. The majority of British producing organisations consider money spent in the dark rooms utter waste.

I do not think that the Trade understand the full value of photographic quality, especially in the negative. How many cameramen have seen their best effort or the consistency of their quality spoilt by bad development?

We know for a fact that negative emulsion has been more or less a failure in this country owing to chemical impurities in the water; yet, there is a firm that uses distilled water in the making of its developing solutions, and few, if any, filter their solutions before use. The first process is necessary to remove impurities, and their detrimental chemical action on the developer; and the latter to remove undissolved crystals and their spot-giving propensities.

Again, how often is a stale or overworked bath used; one that has had a bucket or two taken out every morning and boiled up to heat the bath, because no heating arrangements are fitted to the tank? Freshened up now and again with half-a-bucket of soda? Into this inactive chemical mess the valuable negative is placed. I do not blame the Trade developing houses for this, because I know they have tried to do their best; for they must live, and have found that prices must be cut to obtain orders.

Does one find the special developers in use the pyro or glycerine used with such good results in America, or a slow and fast developer, with which to treat the different classes of negative?

The negative side of laboratory work can never become automatic; it is as great an art as that of producing and camera work. The first-class negative developer is one of the Trade's best friends. When one realises that excellent productions costing thousands of pounds may be entrusted to an inexperienced boy, with inferior materials, for development, there seems small chance of capturing the world's markets, or attaining consistent first-class photographic quality in British productions.

YOUR CORNER

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Freda Kay's reiteration of the general knowledge, to be culled from the daily Press, re "so-called" kinema schools and their "fee-snatching" proclivities, is hardly an answer to my query. My reference was to those without the prefix "so-called." I believe I mentioned a knowledge of at least one genuine studio and successful graduates therefrom.

I will not contend Miss Kay's assertion that most are unsuitable, but neither will I cede the point that all are. Neither are all artistes and agents of that opinion.

So once again I state that the kinema school is still an unexplored source and worthy of exploration, as more than one agent agrees. The others, being men of perception, must have another reason for damning wholesale all schools and all pupils.—A. E. V. (Caplan).

SCREEN VALUES MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"The Glorious Adventure"

Stoll. Starring Lady Diana Manners, Gerald Lawrence, Victor McLaglan, Cecil Humphries and William Luff.

Considered purely as a photoplay, "The Glorious Adventure" would be of little consequence. Apart from the "curiosity value" of its titled star, it is not more than an average program picture. The action has been slowed down, no doubt for the purposes of the colour process, and the screen has a long way to go before it becomes a real advantage to a photoplay. Some of the still life pictures were very beautiful, but the general effect, especially in interiors, is rather a handicap than otherwise, and a few shots devoid of colour, save the moonlight effects, were rather a relief.

Nothing in the acting calls for much comment, but that is mainly because of the lack of opportunity. The characters are puppets and have no chance to make themselves live. William Luff, Victor McLaglan and Cecil Humphries do as well as the limitations or their parts permit, and there are bright flashes from Fred and Haidee Wright.

On the whole one is left with a feeling that it is a pity that such great expectations have produced so little result.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION.—Uneven.

LEADS.—Uninspired.

SUPPORT.—Good in parts.

LITERARY.—Impossible to judge, owing to obvious cutting.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—Slow; effective in parts.

LIGHTING.—Most of the interiors are too dark.

SETTING.—Lavish and spectacular.

EXTERIORS.—Well chosen on the whole; some very beautiful.

THOMAS W. WATTS.

Particulars as to whose career will be found in the adjoining column.

THOS. W. WATTS

ACTOR AND PRODUCER

Thomas W. Watts first came before the public when he wrote and produced the spectacle "Rome under Cæsar," in which upwards of 3,000 artistes took part. The following year he was appointed entertainments manager at Earl's Court, which position he held for three seasons. He was responsible for the Wild West and the French and Italian Exhibitions.

There is no branch of the entertainment profession that he has not figured in, from circus clown; variety artist, legitimate stage, to director of entertainments at the International Exhibition Companies. Possibly there is no organiser with so varied and distinguished a career.

As an athlete, although not actually creating records, he was second in many record-breaking contests, and as a gentleman rider he rode a number of winners. His most notable and sensational win was when he beat Carnival in a mile and a half race on his wonderful little half-bred mare Sarah, the odds being three to one on Carnival. As a boxer and fencer he carried off many valuable trophies.

For the last sixteen years he has devoted his energies to the production of films and Continental carnivals. The following are a few of his recent productions:—"Somewhere in France," "Abide with Me," "The Toilers," "Father O'Flynn," and "Ye Banks and Braes."

He is about, under the auspices of the International Producers' Federation (of which he is the managing director), to make an all-British national super production, in fact an English "Birth of a Nation."

He has even given up an invitation to assist in the organisation in the Battle of Flowers at Nice this coming spring that he may give the whole of his energies to this stupendous undertaking.

Kind and persuasive, he is able to get the very best out of his artistes. A true friend but a very keen opponent. To see him at work in the studio, unassuming, yet full of nervous energy, the artiste to his finger tips, it would be difficult to recognise him as the keen follower of the East Sussex Foxhounds, which is his one and only diversion from business.—

FOURPENCE

What the Press said of Bulfinch in "The Glorious Adventure."

MORNING POST, 17.1.22.

"The best performance was Mr. Victor McLaglen's Bulfinch."

DAILY NEWS, 17.1.22.

"The best acting was done by Mr. Victor McLaglen as Bulfinch."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN, 17.1.22.

"Mr. McLaglen is the force."

EVENING STANDARD, 17.1.22.

"Chief honours go to Mr. Victor McLaglen, who is very effective as the felon."

BIOSCOPE, 19.1.22.

"The outstanding performance of the film is, perhaps, that of Victor McLaglen as the ugly ruffian Bulfinch."

EVENING NEWS, 17.1.22.

"Acting honours go, however, to the boxer, Victor McLaglen, who gave a haunting picture of the bestial prisoner."

STAR, 17.1.22.

"There is one outstanding performance—that of Victor McLaglen as the criminal Bulfinch... the diabolical malignity of his expressions and mannerisms, his whole make-up and conception of this part, stamp him as a new power in the film world."

DAILY MAIL, 17.1.22.

"But the honours of the performance fall to Lady Diana and to Mr. Victor McLaglen as her husband Bulfinch, whose acting and facial expressions are masterly."

REFEREE, 23.1.22.

"The acting honours fall to Victor McLaglen, the boxer, who is making a greater success, I understand, in film-acting than he achieved in the ring. He is helped, to a considerable extent, by his physiognomy—it can't possibly be all make-up—in fact, the greater part of the time it is 'expression-acting,' if I may coin the word, which grips the audience and awakens in their hearts memories of the time when they believed in pirates. I should like to see Stevenson's 'Treasure Island,' with Victor McLaglen as the pirate chief."

FILM RENTER, 21.1.22.

"Acting honours in the production are carried off by Victor McLaglen, who enacts the part of Bulfinch... in the most convincing manner. Mr. McLaglen gave a magnificent rendition of his part, and scored a triumphant success. He is so head and shoulders above all others that when he is on the film the rest of the cast pale by comparison... whilst the whole of his acting throughout does not contain a single flaw."

Sealing its Destiny.

FOR weeks past we have, in our columns, sponsored and fostered the club idea. Last Sunday that idea was realised. We do not go out of our way to claim the credit: what we have done was what any journal that has the real interest of its readers at heart would do. Now that we have presided at its birth, we can leave the sturdy, struggling child to the tender mercies of the family of Club members. With the assistance of the members of the various Committees we have started the Club along the pathway of its life. That done, our chief work, so far as the Club is concerned, is ended. With a detached view we can watch its progress, and can safeguard its interests and can protect its welfare and can contribute to its success. But its destiny has passed from our hands and from the hands of the Formation Committee to the hands of each member. Each member must work for it, and do all that is humanly possible to ensure the smooth running of its wheels. In withdrawing from that degree of personal energy with which we have worked for the Club in the past, we desire to place on record our sincere thanks to every member who has in some way or another (not large or small, because all the labours have been large) lent a hand to the huge task. The results justify the outlay of energy.

A Desperate Move.

ENTERPRISE and initiative deserve every encouragement, but when it is at the expense of others, it ceases to be commendable. One of the smaller Trade papers is running a competition offering prizes amounting in all to £500 for six original scenarios; the main condition being that "the full copyright in each MS., including the film rights," must be assigned to that journal on a printed form. What we protest against most strongly is the intention of forcing competitors to assign copyright and film rights to the paper or to anyone else on the off-chance of securing a prize. The paper states that "in the case of manuscripts not deemed worthy of a prize this assignment will be waived." But the editor of the paper must know that it is not sufficient to waive the assignment. There must be a legal transfer of copyright.

* * *

Pertinent Questions.

A FEW matters that the paper does not attempt to clarify are: Who are the judges? When and where will the winners be declared? What provision is there for the return of unsuccessful MSS.? (This is important in view of the fact that the paper is to hold the copyrights and

¶ Nothing Is perfect.
Neither You
Nor Us
Nor the Club.

¶ Much
Has yet to be done.

¶ A few
Have so far Done it all.

¶ Suggest,
Don't blame.
Because
You could not have done
Any better.

should not be allowed to hold copyrights or MSS. indefinitely.) Which producing company will film the scenario?

* * *

Making a Profit.

AND does the paper seriously imagine that the first prize of £250 is adequate remuneration for the sale of all rights, including film, dramatic, serial, book, translation, and all other rights included in the word "copyright"? We would not have thought that anyone would have been quite so bare-faced in a "clutching-hand" stunt. But worse follows: six reliable and worthwhile scenarios are to be sold outright for £500—an author or scenarist is to surrender a good property for £25. Nor is there any guarantee that the six winning scenarios will be made into films. Surely the terms of this competition are suggestive of what is known in the money-lending business as taking unconscionable profit?

Law of Copyright.

BY the way, while dealing with the subject of scenarios, it may be opportune to mention, for the benefit of those who do not grasp the meaning of the word that "copyright" embraces, according to the Author, not only film rights, but dramatic rights, book rights, serial rights, translation rights. Under the latter heading, of course, we mean translation rights in the dramatic work or in the book production. The film has no translation rights, as through the pictures it speaks to all the world. But the scenario may easily be written into a story, and the story might have valuable translation rights. It is essential that an author should merely grant a licence for the production of his work for a limited time, and have an assurance that his work is put on the market by a definite date, retaining to himself the reversion of his property. What one film actor may desire to act to-day, another film actor of equal renown may desire to act ten or fifteen years hence, creating a fresh market.

The Strength of Unity.

IF it were possible—or wise—to publish the catalogue of complaints that film artistes pour into editorial ears, there would be some bulky volumes involved. As a matter of strict fact, the lot of the film artiste is no better, but considerably worse in many respects, than that of his prototype on the stage. And the exasperating part about it is that he is impotent in the face of his injustices. He cannot help himself. No one else can help him. There is only one hope for the oppressed: united organisation. That is the hope for the kinema artiste: a co-operative movement. A crying need of studioland is the Kinema Artistes' Federation. And the day is not far distant when the K.A.F. will be fighting the artistes battles for them.

Being the Adventures of Adrian Brunel in France and Morocco

January 2:

We got to Paris. I am certain of that. It all comes back to me now. Well—not all; that is too much to expect, but, roughly, 20,000 of the occurrences which happened to us during our 24 hours in Paris.

We arrived in Paris at seven o'clock in the morning, and already most of the cafés were open. It seemed as we drove to our hotel that if one took the total of all the public-houses, restaurants and teashops in London and then quadrupled the number, one would obtain something of the effect of the way Paris is peppered with cafés.

Our only trouble on leaving the station was that we had to leave our case of film stock. We had quite a pleasant little Soviet meeting on the subject, but after three-quarters of an hour's discussion we found ourselves out-voted.

Sir Percy Sykes had arranged to come up from Bordeaux to meet us, and was overdue when we arrived at our hotel. Although I asked for him in French and English, they pretended not to understand me. There were four assistant magistrates seated in the reception-room, and they looked at each other in perplexity. I repeated the name, and explained that we had all booked rooms.

Morocco to the political capital of French Morocco. This is a coincidence, for I was just about to mention our visit to see the much-talked-of French film, "L'Atlantide," which, I am told, was photographed in Morocco.

My experiences since seeing the film ten days ago have been so like a serial film that my recollection of what has gone before is not as clear as if I had written a review immediately after seeing the pictures.

"L'Atlantide" is certainly an interesting film. Although it is unquestionably French, it is the nearest approach to the International film that the Americans are said to aim at. There are many signs of American influence, but it lacks a quality which most good American pictures have—or rather, its director lacks a quality—and that is the ability to be ruthless in cutting. One could not help feeling that the thought of cutting out so many beautiful scenes was so distressing to the director and his advisers, that they decided to leave in so much that the film began to pall in places.

January 12:

Another visit we paid while in Paris was to Debris, the famous French kine. camera manufacturer, our principal camera being a Debris. I wanted a number of masks cut to my own designs, and which I had unfortunately been unable to find anyone to do in London. Debris immediately accepted my order, had it put in hand at once, and arranged for the masks to be sent to me in Morocco in instalments, as they were completed, by aeroplane. For this serial service I had only to pay five francs per instalment.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Hearty congratulations to Harley Knoles, managing director and director of productions of the Alliance Film Co., Ltd., who has taken unto himself a wife. The bride is an American lady, Rosina Henley Morgan. Mr. and Mrs. Knoles, who have been the recipients of a large number of congratulations, will take up their residence at Reigate, Surrey.

Stewart Rome writes to say that during the few weeks interval between the Thompson production of "Dicky Monteith" and his next film, "The Reeping," under the Hardy management, he has been having a holiday in Norfolk where he managed to get in a good amount of riding. He has just signed to play opposite Violet Hopson in three of her forthcoming productions in March.

Let me correct, on behalf of Hardy Steerman, an erroneous statement made in our last issue which was to the effect that Mr. Steerman had been booked through Jay's agency to play for Kenelm Foss. Mr. Steerman has certainly been playing for Foss, but Sid Jay did not negotiate the booking. Mr. Steerman has now been asked through Zeitlie's Agency to play in the Ideal production, "The Lovely Lady of Grosvenor Square," under the direction of Frank Crane.

Was glad to meet Gertrude McCoy yesterday on her return from Holland where she has been playing lead for Granger-Binger in "Thou Shalt Not." Miss McCoy is a veritable globe-trotter these days, but I am hoping that she will remain in London for a while now.

During the last few days I paid a visit to the Walthamstow studios and saw Kenelm Foss at work on "A Romance of Old Baghdad," in which Manora Thew returns to studio life. As this production is a tale of the East, Foss is having the whole of the Walthamstow Studio transformed into an Eastern palace, which process entails a great amount of work. In fact, it is estimated that the principal set will take longer to erect and furnish than any yet utilised in a British film studio.

There was a big scene down at the Alliance last week in which more than 200 people took part. One lady super was very busy telling everyone that her father had spent over one thousand pounds on her film education—that was not so bad, but I think her other remarks were rather amusing. Just after the minuet dance, in which she was one of the two hundred dancers, she rushed over to a friend. "My dear," she said, "my partner was a most terrible dancer—I shall be so nervous at the Trade show!"

From the club billiard-room a certain cameraman stood gazing at the huge illuminated globe on top of the Coliseum, which changes colours every few minutes. "That must be the place where they tint those films," he observed, and noticing the many colours, added, "I bet they've got 'The Glorious Adventure' up there."

At the club the other night I met H. B. Parkinson, of Master Films, who tells me that he has commenced work on a new series of song pictures. The new pictures are screen versions of all this year's latest songs. One of the other song pictures, when shown at the Globe, Acton, was encored and had to be shown again. This, Mr. Parkinson believes, is the first time on record that a film has been encored.

Olaf Hytten is at it again! He has transferred his villainies to the Teddington Studios where he has been a drunken husband and wife beater all through a picture called "Angels." Hytten has always been chosen for wife beating parts.

The latest well-known figure in society to be attracted by the lure of the screen is Dayang Muda of Sarawak (Mrs. Bertram Brooke) daughter of the late Sir Walter Palmer, one of the founders of the famous firm of Huntley and Palmer, and sister-in-law to the Maharajah of Sarawak. This lady is one of the directors of Big Four Famous Productions, the latest British film producing company, which is now at work on "Potter's Clay," the big film written round the personality of Miss Ellen Terry. Another director is C. Eric Smith, who, following thrilling experiences at sea during the war, was for some time the acting British naval attaché at Christiania.

ACCORDING TO CLIFT

At the monthly lecture of the Stoll Picture House Club last week, the gathering was entertained by a paper which Denison Clift read on "The Difference between English and American Films."

Mr. Clift detailed what he described as the actual germ of the idea of cinematography. Senator Stanford, he said, who was intensely interested in horse-racing, had one particular animal of whose wonderful action he was anxious to keep a perpetual record. He therefore arranged on the course a series of 70 or 80 cameras, each of which made an exposure as the passing horse broke a thread attached to the shutter.

engaged in it should have an eye for the dramatic effect of the whole.

The quality of imagination was equally vital. It was essential not to show everything, but to leave to the audience the opportunity of building up and completing a picture for themselves. One of the greatest faults, not only in American pictures, but also in British ones, was that many of the people at the heads of producing organisations gave the audiences credit for no intelligence at all. They wanted to write everything down to a low level, and people now found that pictures were below their level.

As to sincerity, unless a person tried to

AIDS TO SCREEN ACTING

by KATHLEEN VAUGHAN

In the dressing-room we discussed the question: "What are the best aids to screen acting?"

A flippant flapper friend, who does not act for the pictures, promptly exclaimed that the most inspiring accessory to her mind was a nice young man to play "opposite" her!

Needless to say, we laughed, but there is something in what she said; a sympathetic vis-a-vis is a great help towards good work for the screen. One does not, however, choose with whom one will act, and naturally, it occasionally happens, through no fault on either side, that leading players are temperamentally unsuited to act together, and this is pretty sure to show in their work.

It seems a soulless thing to worry about, but one very practical aid to good acting is a comfortable dressing-room—comfortable and warm. Grease-paint does not keep noses warm or prevent one's flesh from going "goosey." It is not easy to fan oneself and pretend that warm southern breezes are causing you a delicious languor when every instinct urges you to stamp around and do arm-flapping exercises.

Often from an arctic dressing-room one dashes to a draughty studio, where for one hour out of three, maybe, work is done close under blazing arc-lights. For the moment, you are in the tropics. You do not require to be temperamental for such violent changes of atmosphere; what one really needs is a physique of cast-iron.

To come at last, however, to something temperamental, something that will create emotion and aid its expression; in my opinion, there is only one such aid—it is music.

If suitable music could be played in the studio whilst one is attempting to portray joys or sorrows one may never have actually experienced, it would, I am convinced, help the artiste very materially. Some directors have already realised this fact, and music is one of the aids to screen acting that the thoughtful director makes full use of.

Pretty dresses, successful make-up, and a good meal, help towards a general feeling of well-being; but it is, of course, possible to act in rags—I have done it in "The Prince and the Beggar Maid"; and often one's make-up has to be more uncomfortable than beautiful, and often a meal is missed in the excitement of the shoot, but none of these things will spoil one's acting.

The three aids I first mentioned—widely different as they are—do prove almost indispensable if the best the artiste is capable of is to be brought out.

SONGS ON KINE SUBJECTS

MORE MAXIMS OF HAFIZ

(A long way after Kipling)

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

IF it be pleasant to look on, made in the English mart,
Then the Exhibitor murmurs; "It's pretty, but is it Art?"
If it be made in America, artless in word and deed,
"Book it en bloc at once!" he cries. "It's just what the public need."

*God! How I hate these Trade Shows! Yet though my heart is vexed,
And I was rotten in this one—p'raps I'll be good in the next.*

Friend, though the Critics are gracious—reflect. Is it all for you?
The Past was conceived by the Author, and the Camera helped you through.

Are you a Star in the Heavens? Lonely, and cold are they.
Better to join the Kinema Club, and mix with the Milky Way.

Lo, a Director died! In the Highest Heaven I sought him.
For once—just once—he had worked for Art, and not for the money it brought him.

Lo, a Director lived! In the Lowest Hell I found him, Wandering, lost in a plotless Film, with his Missus's "close-ups" round him.

If he be young and guileless, bragging of untold wealth,
Longing to start Productions, for the sake of Art, and his health Fleece him! But fleece him gently. Remember how sheep are made.
For though your gain is the Cash He'll lose, your Credit belongs to the Trade.

This version of the earliest attempt to photograph motion brought, in the subsequent discussion, a correction on a point of fact from the Editor of this journal, who was able to quote to Mr. Clift chapter and verse for the Friese-Greene patents, dating from 1883, which were, without any doubt, the earliest attempts to record movement photographically, using cameras, projectors, and celluloid film which did not differ in any fundamental principle from those at present in use.

Since the lecturer came to Europe a year ago, he had seen the French, the Italian, the German, and the Dutch studios, and he gave an interesting estimate of the relative values. The three necessary elements he demanded were dramatic power, imagination, and, above all, sincerity. Hence the importance of the director himself presiding over the cutting, which was far from a simple process. Every person take his work seriously and felt the inspiration of the story, he was a failure. "Only what you put into it will the public get out of it." The only thing an audience cared about a picture was whether it was good or bad.

There were three reasons, he thought, which were against the British Director. The first was the lack of technique, the second was the failure to spend enough money on the adequate presentation of a picture, and the third was the innate conservatism of the heads of producing organisations. The strength of Britain lay in keeping its own atmosphere in pictures and refusing to ape the Americans, except, perhaps, in technical matters.

Kathleen Mason, who has organised this series of lectures, then threw the matter open for discussion, and some interesting points of view were submitted.

KINEMA SHOTS—No. 2. THE ARTISTE

by MAJOR H. HODGSON BENTLEY

HE was out of employment—drawing no dole,
A qualified engineer, something in coal.
He met an old Army pal, natty and neat,
With cigar and smart patents encasing his feet,
Strolling along in a manner sublime,
To where unemployed Thespians pass by their time,
Midst strange popping noises and gurgles and sighs,
And rumours of splendid shops straight from the skies.

HE dragged our pet engineer into the din,
As he lifted his glass he thought he looked thin.
(The engineer fellow, I mean, not the beer, That's been quite thin now for many a year.)
"Laddie, you're out of work—can't find a job?
What about earning a quid and a bob?
Your height is all right, and you've got a film face,
Come round to Roma—he'll get you a place."

HE got his first crowd job, working at Stoll's,
An interesting business and cleaner than coals.
He's working in crowds now, a guinea a day—
He sees plenty of life—not very much pay.

A MONTH passes by, and they give him a part—
It's not much, it's true, but he takes it to heart;
He's working small parts now—that's two quid a day,
He's still seeing lots of life—not lots of pay.

ONE morning he's wanted because he's a type.
He asks a big figure—he thinks the time's ripe.
He funks it a bit—asks a tenner a day,
He hears a few home-truths, but gets it next day.

HE'S quite a big star now, he's quite a la mode,
He's forgotten the Thespian who showed him the road.
But so we go on at a guinea a day,
With plenty of life—not very much pay

Joan Griffith has returned from Italy, where she has been playing in "Meg's Children" for Seal.

Thelma Murray has been at Cricklewood playing a leading part in the latest Sherlock Holmes episode.

Elisabeth Brandt is leaving for Sweden to negotiate the Swedish rights of "The Night Hawk," the new International Artists.

Gertrude McCoy, having finished her work in "Thou Shalt Not" with Granger-Binger, is again back at 180, Sutherland Avenue, Maida Vale, W.

AN ARTISTES' IMPRESSIONS

by SARA FRANCIS

Sunday last, opening day of the Kinema Club, will undoubtedly number amongst the happiest events which I have had the opportunity to witness, and one that I am sure never to forget. It brought back to me many dear memories of days gone by, though not so far distant.

In the brilliant gathering of members and their guests, it gave me great pleasure to notice several well-known artistes, who, may I be permitted to say, bore a striking resemblance to certain of the great Continental celebrities. Thus, lifting the dim veil of the past, when, some years ago, I used to spend many happy evenings at the Cercle Artistique in Paris, I could almost imagine seeing standing right in front of me a living picture of the great French tragedian Paul Mounet, of "Bells" and "Othello" fame, whose double was almost perfect.

Likewise, a few paces farther, in earnest talk with Florence Turner, full of charm and expression, and so alike to my former partner of the "Deux Orpelines" stood a gentleman whose elegant stature and clean cut features positively reminded me of André Brule, the French "Arsene Lupin," another great favourite with the English audiences.

Were it not for the lack of space, I might mention many others whose presence completed my illusion, and thus unknowingly contributed to the pleasure of that charming evening.

Now, reverting to more positive facts, I must first do honour to Mr. Ridgwell, who, in the course of his speech, expressed many kindly and generous thoughts for the artistes' cause. I more especially refer to the scheme for the establishment of a Sick and Benevolent Fund. This is a great idea, with a much needed purpose, and it should be the duty of us all to help Mr. Ridgwell's efforts by the closest co-operation.

I also ask special permission to record my personal appreciation of the great success which the Hon. Secretary has achieved in the matter of organisation of this Club, which, although in its infancy, promises to become a very great thing. I share the view already expressed that for him to accomplish such a task when already engaged in the editorial duties of the STUDIO, must have necessarily meant an enormous amount of labour, and imposed a tremendous strain upon his energy. It was a very ambitious scheme indeed, the realisation of which may be justly considered as a crowning success for Mr. Allighan and his colleagues of the Executive Committee.

We have now at last a club where, unlike those on the Continent or elsewhere, those engaged in the production of motion pictures may be brought together in a spirit of close friendship and co-operation, thus serving a double purpose: social and professional. This very idea will ensure the ultimate and absolute success of the Kinema Club—our club.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

If there had been turnstiles at 9, Great Newport Street on Sunday last they would have recorded an attendance of nearly 600 people. The crush was a fine augury for the future; and even those with a stand-up seat in the general lounge and those with a sit-down seat on the stairs were good-humoured and good-natured enough to overlook the little inconveniences and join in the jollity of the evening.

* * *

We were all very pleased to see Florence Turner at the Club and glad to know that she is a fellow-member. Miss Turner's cheery smile and merry jest ought to be one of the features of Club life.

* * *

Several of the heads of producing concerns were on the Club premises during the week. I ran into Jeffrey Bernerd (Stoll), S. Rowson (Ideal) and H. B. Parkinson (Masters) all on the same evening.

* * *

By the way, it is not generally known that Geoffrey Benstead almost came level to John Mannoek on the scoring board at the billiard match on Sunday. He was eight behind.

* * *

I believe the secretary is looking for the person corpulent enough and strong enough to be responsible for sitting in one of the big lounges heavily enough to smash the leg. I wonder who it could have been?

* * *

Congratulations are to be heard on all sides with reference to the catering service at the Club. The food supplied is excellent thanks to the expert French chef who comes to the Club with years of experience at the Carlton Hotel and other big places.

One Section of the crowded General Lounge on the Club's Opening Night

"No. 9, GREAT NEWPORT STREET, W.C.2."

ENTHUSIASTIC OPENING OF THE KINEMA CLUB

After many months of waiting, the Kinema Club has at last been opened, and the British film producing profession has made another big stride forward. Since Sunday's opening, messages of congratulation have been pouring in from all sides, and every message has spoken of the very successful opening.

Long before the set time of opening, crowds of artistes, directors, cameramen, scenarists and others tried to squeeze into the general lounge where the opening ceremony was performed. Congestion was inevitable, but everyone took it in the most good natured manner possible.

A. E. Newbould, M.P., declared the Club open, and Frank A. Tilley, the chairman, in his opening remarks, said that one of the chief reasons why the idea of the club originated was that there were some who thought that it would be a means of real co-operation between all sides of the British producing industry.

He pointed out that by the co-operation of a handful of enthusiasts the Club had been launched. If so small a number could achieve such a result, then the co-operation of every member would open up wonderful possibilities in British production.

A. E. Newbould spoke of the early days of the industry, when everyone was just a learner. Things had advanced since then and the profession was now a highly technical business. The Club he regarded as another step forward. Such an institution had long been wanted. The people in the profession would now have the opportunity of getting together and exchanging ideas and could improve British films to a great extent.

It was no use one British firm turning out good pictures, every firm had to do it, otherwise the producing business in England would die away. He concluded his remarks by wishing the Club every success.

George Ridgwell called the previous meeting the christening, this one he characterised as the confirmation. At last a club had been formed and now that it had been opened he wanted the members to be pleased with it.

Speaking of the Kinema Club production, which will be made every year, he estimated that £10,000 profit would be made and that it could be used as a benevolent fund and for improving the Club premises.

J. Stuart Blackton said that he found, on looking in the dictionary, that a club was a stick or piece of wood, with one end thicker than the other and used for striking with. The other definition of club was a number of persons banded together for some common purpose.

He had seen many clubs come and go in America, now he did not think there was a single Kinema Club in existence in the States. He could not explain why these clubs had failed, unless they had got hold of the wrong definition in the dictionary.

In order to make the club a success it was necessary to have officers; it was the members' duty to support their officers. He wanted the members to think big, for it was only by thinking big that anyone would achieve anything.

"Think Big," was a slogan that the Kinema Club should adopt, then its success would be assured.

Rex Davis proposed a vote of thanks to all those who had given a hand in establishing the Club.

Over five hundred people were present on Sunday, although the fog was so thick that trams and buses had to be stopped. The musical entertainment was a very attractive one and many well-known people gave their services. Dancing went on till twelve o'clock. Geoffrey Benstead and John Mannock, the billiard expert, opened the billiard table.

That the Club will be a success is certain. The premises have been well patronised by members ever since the opening. Lunch-time is particularly popular. The dining room between twelve and three is a picture of animation.

FROM THE SECRETARY'S OFFICE

Sincere thanks to all those who so loyally assisted me to make the Opening Function the enormous success it was. What has resulted is due to the co-operation and enthusiastic service of every member of every committee, and to make distinctions would be as odious as to make comparisons. And the fact that during the whole of that strenuous Sunday I never heard one growl is proof of the capacities of the Club members for organisation.

And now that the Club is opened the work of the Formation Committee and myself ends. Our function was to form the Club. We have done it. Our work may evidence its own defects, but it is our best. And now that it is opened it is for the members to run their own Club. They must control its destinies. They must work for it. If there are duties to be performed the members must get busy and do them.

I am making arrangements for the finishing touches to be put here, there and everywhere about the Club, and extra furniture, rugs and seating for the billiard room has been ordered, so that within a month the whole service of the Club will be in smooth running order.

So far as catering is concerned, we have arranged for an à la carte menu to be introduced for dinner, instead of the table d'hôte service. The half-crown luncheons are highly popular, and when certain improvements in that service have been introduced extra tables will be brought into use.

During the next few days the bar will be shifted from the men's lounge to the Secretary's room, and the Secretary will be moved to another part of the building. The effect of this will be to keep the men's lounge quiet and restful for smoking, reading and writing.

I am very anxious that members should feel at liberty to send in suggestions for the improvement of the Club and its service. These will always be given full consideration.

On Sunday several sat down to supper without paying. I am relying on their honesty and sense of fairness to forward the cost to me, so that I can settle with the caterers. Members who have not yet paid their subscriptions are doing a grave disservice to the Club. E. G. A.

On the first floor, where the lunches are served, there is also the general lounge for both ladies and gentlemen. The gentlemen have a comfortable lounge and bar on the second floor.

Ladies' card rooms, writing rooms, dressing rooms and lounge occupy the third floor.

The kitchen, billiard room and card room are situated on the fourth floor.

CAMERAMEN AND THE CLUB

With the opening of the Kinema Club comes a new era in the history of the British film industry. The club has long been needed, and it is only after many weeks of hard work on the part of the committees that the club has eventually been opened. While it will certainly prove itself a boon and a blessing to the whole industry, the cameraman will particularly appreciate the opportunity of having somewhere to go, some place where he can have food in comfort, where he can meet fellow cameramen and where he can rest.

The cameramen have long advocated a club, such as the one now formed, but no great notice was taken of the schemes submitted by the Kine-Cameramen's Society. About a year ago one was nearly formed, but lack of interest in it resulted in the scheme falling through.

To the cameramen, the club will become one of the essentials of life. Any spare time he has can now be spent in the club. He can meet his friends there, lunch there; in fact there are a hundred and one uses to which he can put it.

Little wonder that a large number of cameramen have become members. The idea seems to have got round, however, that Topical men are not admitted. That idea is wrong. There are quite a number of Topical men already members, because they have seen the advantages the club offers.

Then there are others who say that they are not wanted in the club and that if they did join they would be treated with scant respect. Such men have evidently a very poor idea of themselves as cameramen.

The cameramen already in the club have found that they are as welcome as anyone else. According to the reasoning of some cameramen, the artiste could bring up the same argument and say that they are not wanted by the cameramen in the club.

There is no snobbishness in the club and the cameraman knows, as well as anyone else, that such statements are absolutely unfounded.

The other cameramen in the club will be the first to admit that cameramen are well treated and always welcome.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

I am sorry to hear that George Ploughman, a well-known member of the K.C.S., has had both his legs broken and one arm smashed, through going over a cliff in a motor. Ploughman has been out in the Congo with an expedition, and he is now in hospital, where, according to his letter, he is being well looked after.

Charlie Heath has been to and from Ireland four times in the last fortnight. He has been filming for Topical. The latest issue of the "Topical Budget" contains some night snow scenes taken with the now famous "Potted Sunshine." The new lamps give a steady light, last a minute, and have a blue instead of yellow flare.

Leslie Eveliegh is starting work on his second Davidson film, which will be a screen adaption of a well-known book. He will film the exteriors at Torquay.

A certain Topical cameraman was sent to film a well-known man's baby daughter. The man in question was an ardent amateur photographer, and took up a great deal of time in setting the tripod for the cameraman. In a sarcastic tone, the cameraman asked the gentleman what exposure he would give the film. This was the amazing reply, "Stop down to sixteen and give it a second's exposure." Lucky he was not wanting to film a five-reeler.

Basil Emmott is filming the next Gaumont production, which Capt. Calvert is making. It is a big super-film, which should contain plenty of scope for Emmott's abilities as a photographer.

One of Pathé's cameramen was sent up to Buxton last week to film snow scenes. It was raining hard when he arrived, and the snow had thawed. On arriving back in London he found a telegram which said that the snow had started again, and once more the town lay beneath its spotless mantle. The remarks of the cameraman are not recorded, but under much less provocation cameramen can be wonderfully expressive.

Some cameramen may sympathise and think of the time when they experienced the same. It was during the filming of a certain big event. One cameraman with a Moy, after the procession had passed, was seen fumbling about inside the camera. Another cameraman went to investigate and, if possible, to lend a hand. It transpired that the cameraman with the Moy had inserted the handle in the wrong hole, and while the procession had been passing he had been reversing.

Alfred Moses has just received a letter from America which says, "Dear Mr. Moses: You may remember me and you may not. I met you ten years ago with the Thanhauser Company out here. It was only through seeing your advertisement in THE MOTION PICTURE STUDIO that I knew you were in England, and was able to find your address." Speaks for itself! "TRIPOD."

STUDENT MEMBERS

I have received a letter from Rodier Heath, in reply to the George Woods-Taylor article published last week:—

George Woods-Taylor, in his reply to M. P. Prout's article which appeared in your December 3 issue, states that no society admits members until they are fully qualified. Quite so. But some societies do admit those who are far from proficient as "student" members. This is done in order that the beginner may benefit by the lectures which are held, and by the technical library which the society usually possess.

It is just when a person is commencing the study of any subject that such help is most useful. In my first letter I mentioned one such society; I believe there are several others.

How Mr. Woods-Taylor got the impression that I wish to reach the top via the elevator I am unable to say; surely becoming a student member of any society is starting at the bottom. He seems to take it for granted that I wish to avoid dark-room work; such is not the case. I have tried to get into the photographic department of various producing firms in any capacity, but without success. Is not the crux of the whole matter summed up in that paragraph of Mr. Woods-Taylor's letter in which he asks if it would be fair for the K.C.S. to help student members who might later compete against the present members?

The K.C.S. has decided that such a course would be most unfair!

COLOUR PROCESS

A well-known cameraman, who should know, declares that millions of dollars and many years of time have been expended in research looking to the perfection of a practical motion camera which should photograph in natural colours without "fringe," distortion, refraction and absorption, says the American Cinematograph.

Whether motion photography in colours is entirely desirable for photoplays or not is a subject for another story, but it will not be questioned that for scenic, scientific and educational subjects, colour photography is not only desirable, but, in the treatment of many subjects, necessary.

It has remained for a Los Angeles cameraman to solve the problem of colour photography, and to produce a camera that will take two negatives simultaneously through a single lens, making them exact duplicates and eliminating, as aforesaid, all fringe, distortion, refraction and absorption, and at the same time get 100 per cent. more light on each negative.

The mechanical design of the camera is not at all radical; on the other hand, there is simplicity in every detail, the camera embodying new applications of well-known mechanical principles.

One unique feature is the design of the shutter which enable a 20 per cent. greater opening than is possible in the ordinary shutter.

YOUR CORNER

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

FILM WORK IN GERMANY.

I have been in Germany now for about a month on a business matter, and during this time have visited in Berlin, Dresden, Frankfurt and Hamburg some of the picture houses. The films now shown are practically all German productions. The chief reason, of course, is that with the exchange, the very low rate of the mark, they cannot buy foreign films.

In the main I find the German films deal with sensational stories—well done from the point of backgrounds and mountings generally, but technically they are very faulty. Photography and lighting is bad.

The film production and trade generally appears to be flourishing, for new production and trading companies are daily being formed.

There are Kinema Artistes' Clubs and also a Kinema Artistes' Association, similar to the Actors' Organisation. The actors—of course, from the speaking stage mostly—are very badly made up.—ERIC H. ALBURY.

"STAR WORSHIP."

I read with much interest the letter from Brooksbank Walton, published in your last issue, on the subject of 'Star Worship,' in which he mentions the recent American criticism, part of which is that our men lack 'pep.'

It is unfortunately true that we have to admit the justice of this criticism in a great many cases, but in doing so we should at once seek out the causes of our failing.

In my own humble opinion, one of the root causes is to be found in the reluctance of directors to test the ability of the more or less untried artiste. Why not let us be original for once, get out of our groove, and tap fresh sources for talent?

I suggest that this could be conveniently done by producing companies' representatives meeting together at regular intervals, when likely aspirants could be submitted to a fair test. Criticism need not necessarily be indulged in, but subsequent negotiations would be carried on between the company so desiring and the artiste.

How often do we find, in all departments of service, sterling qualities wasted for want of opportunity? And yet one of the greatest difficulties of the artiste to-day is to get into touch with the director.

Directors should keep in mind the truth of the saying: "There are just as good fish in the sea as ever yet were caught."—VICTOR COMPTON.

The letter of Freda Kaye, in your issue of January 14, might be more effective if

(1) We were convinced that she indited it herself.

(2) It did not unfortunately overlook facts.

Has Miss Kaye forgotten—others besides myself have not—the course of lessons which she had about eighteen months ago at a certain Training College for Kinema Artistes? Has she forgotten that it is largely to those same lessons that she owes her present success?

I do not write to papers usually, but I do love fair play; and, when I remember that Freda Kaye was a student with me, and that we both (with many others who seek to hide the fact) obtained our technical knowledge at the school, it makes me angry to read such inspired nonsense.

Why be ashamed of an experience to which no shame attaches?—V. M. M.

DIRECTOR AND AUTHOR

by GEOFFREY H. MALINS, O.B.E.

The position of the author in the studio—the author whose published works are the basis upon which films are produced—is one which, as, Rafael Sabatini says in his article in the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO of January 7, should be defined. He, at all events, has a right to expect, so far as its literary form is concerned, some permanence for his works, and he "depends," I agree, "for his livelihood upon cumulative popularity which will maintain the circulation of the books he may have written throughout his career." Mr. Sabatini is a distinguished writer, a first-class craftsman—if one may be permitted to use this term—and one who, moreover, takes the films seriously, and happily a big interest in his work. If an author be capable of adapting his own work for the screen, it is well that he should do so.

I have in my mind the statements of more than one distinguished author that the scenarist—I prefer to call him a film-wright—has made a better story for the film than the author did for the novel-reading public.

The novelist depends upon his imaginative powers for the creation of his characters. The breath of their life is language, and their strength is the strength of the language which creates them. The characters of Dickens lived because he used language so powerful, so vivid, that the imagination of the reader was quickened and his intelligence interpreted the novelist's own ideas. Even with all his gift of description and word-painting, the Dickens characters would not have lived in the minds of the people as they have done, but for the creative and artistic genius of men like Cruickshank and Fred Barnard. It is the men who draw pictures of characters who make them real to the ordinary man and woman not gifted with strong imagination or a highly trained intelligence that can build a structure from words.

The fiction-writer must always depend upon the intelligence of his readers to interpret his meanings and his descriptions. The best sellers in the world of fiction are not the men with the best literary style, but the men who write in flesh and blood terms, who visualise every character in language that begets in the mind of the readers beings who are as real to them as the people they see and meet every day.

The film director is the creator of fact—the converter of fiction into fact. His characters are real flesh and blood, and although he can only show shadows on the screen, each shadow must have a personality that stands out clearly and distinctly, pulsating with life, and capable of rousing emotions that are beyond those which mere language can arouse.

Hence it sometimes happens—it almost always does so when the author, unlike Mr. Sabatini, omits to co-operate in the creation of his characters into the living characters of the screen—that the imaginative work of novelists will not stand the screen creative process; and the director, who is every bit as much an artist as the novelist, is compelled to create a character which sometimes only faintly resembles that of the novelist's brain.

It is only by blending the imaginative powers of the novelist with the practical visualisation of the director that one gets the right perspective and succeeds in making alive on the screen the creation of the novelist, which depends upon the varying degrees of his power, and of the intelligence of his readers.

I entirely agree with Mr. Sabatini that the established author who writes specially for the screen must "be assured that what he writes for the screen shall go upon the screen, and not what someone else thinks he should have written; not someone else's garbled interpretation of what he has actually written, or someone else's improvisations upon themes which he has laboured to perfect." That is exactly what Mr. Sabatini obtains for himself—as he is entitled to do—but even then, as his practice has been, he must leave to the director (having reached harmony with him in the script) the actual film creation.

By the double visualisation and co-operation of author and director—the one from the literary point of view and the other from the production end—the clearest definition is obtained, and the blunders of which he complains are not then possible. The results of this combination have proved a great success.

But supposing the director is left to his own devices. He may see, as he often does, that imagination has outstripped fact. He is not able to join with the author and create with his co-operation a character, a story, and a sequence which will bear the mark of reality. The production must depend upon his artistic perceptions and upon the experience he possesses of film characterisation, which is, after all, the directors' business.

A director may be a craftsman, but he must also be an artist. He must be capable of creating. No man can successfully direct a picture unless he has—before he takes the floor of the studio—visualised the story, created in his mind the atmosphere, and lived the characters as clearly in his mind as if he saw them drawn by an artist.

Nothing on the screen that does not live on it is of any value. To create life on the screen is the directors' business. To make it live in the book is the author's business.

Author, Director, and Artiste form the trinity upon which successful production is founded. A trinity is essential to success, and my experience goes to show that this is impossible unless it has been secured before the producer takes the floor.

by HUGH E. WRIGHT.

Hugh E. Wright, in addition to his recognised histrionic ability, is a skilled wielder of the pen. By the courtesy of the Actor we are able to reproduce, in serial form, one of Hugh's literary effusions.

CHAPTER VI.

The old man dreamily moved towards the door, but paused, with his hand on the latch :

"They are putting you on five reels, aren't they?"

"I believe so," said Alice, rather surprised.

The old man looked at the floor, and shuffled, as though he were ashamed of something. "I wonder if you'd mind putting in a word for me," he said hurriedly, in a low tone. "It's a shame to ask you, but really—I'd do anything anything. The mock turtle—or some end of a Jabberwock—"

Alice's eyes filled with tears. She took his old hand in her two small ones. "If they'll let me," she said. "If they'll let me—oh, I'll make them let me—and if you wouldn't mind, I'd like you to be my White Knight. You are the White Knight to me . . . sans peur et sans reproche! Will you?"

The old Actor bent down and kissed her hand. Then he turned and went out without a word. When Alice looked at her hand, there were two big drops on it. They might almost have been tears, too, only, of course, a grown man doesn't cry, does he?

Alice hadn't been alone a minute before the Director came in.

"Now, if we're all ready, we've got to get a move on," he said briskly.

"Oh, must we?" said Alice; she felt nervously in her pocket for the fourpence. She had heard her father say how expensive moving was.

"Well, I guess America never got a masterpiece without moving some," he replied, with a satisfied smile.

"I suppose they moved them from England and the Continent," said Alice innocently.

"I guess America can make her own masterpieces," said the Director, suspiciously. "We invented Democracy; we've got red blood in our veins. You know what Democracy is?"

"Isn't it what marries our aristocracy to get blue blood into its veins?" asked Alice.

"I can't stand here arguing with you, Kid, we got to get to work." He beckoned imperiously to Alice, and she followed him through the open door.

She found herself back in the big room she had originally started in. Almost as soon as she entered, a group caught her eye. It consisted of Bill—the Lizard—lying on the floor with a bandage round his head, while a party of men round him were trying to revive him in various ways.

"I must have kicked him harder than I thought," said Alice to herself, "if he's still as bad as all that. I do hope he won't recognise me."

The Director led her up to the round little Comedian. "Take her to your room and get her made up, there's a good boy," he said.

The Comedian grinned amiably at Alice, and led her to a little room. Telling her to sit down, he plastered her face with yellow grease, and then started making up her eyes with a black liner.

"Keep 'em open, I shan't hurt you!" he said cheerily, and promptly stuck it in the corner of her eye and hurt her very much.

This Period of Depression.

THOSE who have known the British motion picture industry the longest are the most emphatic in asserting that there has never before been such a period of depression as has obtained during the past three months. Fortunately for all, there are unmistakable signs that the sun is about to rise and chase away the gloom of night with the radiance of its presence. And this fact justifies us in reviewing the dying period of depression and not so much draw-deductions as ascertain actual causes. It is to be feared that the Industry will not stand another such period, and if it is to avoid this dread possibility it must seek to discover the poison in the wells. And to do so some hard knocks must be given and received, but there will be no stooping to personalities.

* * *

The Old and the New.

THAT, as a matter of fact, is one of the causes of the insecurity of the industry: a religious regard for persons instead of a dedication of all the passions and powers of all the persons for the aggregate good of the whole industry.

To be brutally candid, the industry got into the hands of the wrong kind of people, and now that the new and the right type of person is acquiring greater control so the industry becomes more sound proportionately. The old type was blatantly crude, soullessly inartistic and emphatically unintelligent. They were unintelligent enough seriously to believe (or energetically to pretend to believe) that the industry depended upon them instead of them on the industry. These kinema captains dominated and domineered. Their control was a curse and their blessing a blight. Inherently inartistic as they were, they regarded films in terms of box office receipts, never as works of art. And above everything, beneath everything, and including everything was their never-ending belief in their own all-importance to the industry.

Art or Artfulness.

THIS type of kinema captain was prepared to sacrifice everything and everybody on the altar of their own sordid commercialism. And the full blast of their monstrous attitude is being felt now. Artistic people and wealthy financiers have been scared off by these kinema captains, and the industry kept on such a low plane that the English Review allows Gordon Craig to say in its columns that "all that it (the kinema) touches it smears." He asserts that "it glorifies the lowest in the terms of the highest," and that it is a fatal investment for all that is best in contemporary life. Gordon Craig offers four pages of print, some of which is inane, work, scheme and agitate, not for the good of the individual but for the good of the whole industry. It may sound altruistic, but it is really an elemental of materialism to assert that each individual must practice a system of self-abnegation: "I will be anything or I will be nothing so long as the whole industry gains." In that way only will the individual gain.

Thinking Big.

IN the past, too, there has been a marked and lamentable absence of true leadership and statesmanship. J. Stuart Blackton, in his speech at the opening of the Kinema Club, made an oblique reference to this when he said "Let the Club and the motion picture industry take for its motto 'Think Big.'" One of the faults of the past, which has also been one of the causes of the depression of the present, has been a mental pettiness. Cheese-paring policies in productions and in outlook have been the order. Scrappiness and thinness have become the governing code. The whole industry has been run in a small way—any village general shop could outshine some studios in point of organisation and administration. And some insane; but a little is sound common-sense. And he has recognised that the old kinema captains have blighted the great art of film-drama by their soullessness and blatant commercialism.

* * *

Materialistic Altruism.

BUT there is a progressive movement. apparent. The old type is giving place to men with artistic, selfless mentalities. Men who are intelligent enough to see that the prosperity and welfare of all engaged in film production is bound up in the industry, and as the industry expands, advances and progresses, so do the individual fortunes of those who are associated with that industry. There is obviously only one method by which the fortunes and futures of those engaged in the industry will be assured, and that is a readiness on the part of the individual to as there is always an affinity of spirit among types, so the small-minds of the industry have attracted other small-minds. The result is that—with notable exceptions—the industry has got into the hands of these folks, and their short-sightedness and lack of vision or genuine enterprise has left its mark on all that is done in British Studioland.

* * *

The Good Year.

THIS journal has repeatedly asserted that a good time is coming and that 1922 is going to be the best year yet for the British motion picture industry, and people have laughed and pointed to the present period of depression and marked us down as fatuous optimists. But we're not. We're not optimists, fatuous or otherwise. We have merely read the signs of the times.

LINKING THE STUDIOS WITH THE PUBLIC

by TOM TERRISS (New York)

It seems to me that if the director and exhibitor could be better affiliated, many of the prejudices that exist on the part of the exhibitor would be eliminated. Personally, I make it a habit to go around amongst many of my exhibitor friends and, over a cigar, argue these very points, and many a valuable hint have I thus obtained.

The exhibitor is in a position to view pictures from a different angle to that of the director. Although I may in certain situations see something that appeals to me as artistically beautiful; yet, in many others, more commonplace and homely, an exhibitor will turn to me and say: "Ah! That is the kind of thing that always goes over with my audience." I have tried to remember this, and in coming upon a similar situation have worked it up to a greater extent than I would before have deemed advisable.

I think (perhaps I am somewhat prejudiced in saying so) that the independent director will be the big factor of the future. On the whole, it is impossible to turn out human pictures in a vast factory such as the big companies are to-day controlling. Such pictures must invariably bear the trade mark, "Machine made." This cannot be otherwise. A man's individuality is completely lost by his surroundings, and the most human-made picture, after it has passed through the various processes deemed advisable and subjected to the petty and insignificant alterations of the man in the office, must, by necessity, become mostly mechanical.

The man who has the greatest opportunity is the man who makes his own independent productions without hindrance. He can choose his own theme, select his own cast, take his own time, cut, edit and supervise his own production, and place it upon the market. His very own: the captain of his soul.

He can truthfully say: "I alone made it," or "I alone killed it." He can rise or fall by the merit of his own work.

In comparison with a man who makes pictures for a complex organisation, with its many pitfalls, the independent director is the one who has the greatest opportunity to rise.

I have many a time sat in a theatre with an exhibitor watching a director's work upon the screen, and have heard the remark made: "Why did he do that?" or "Why didn't he do this?" It has been impossible for me to explain to my friend the reason; but down in my heart, in nine cases out of ten, I know the reason. The fault lies in what has been done to the picture after it has left the director's hands.

I ask you, how is it possible for men who think of nothing but combines and monetary conditions to appreciate the psychology which a director may be endeavouring to subtly introduce into the characters which live upon the screen?

Hampered and hedged round by the almost impossible conditions which exist, it is a marvel to me that, in spite of so many obstacles, so many good pictures ever see the light of day.

I have only one complaint to make against the exhibitor, and that is: Why the extraordinary antipathy, in the majority of cases, to giving the director the credit which should be his due? I know it for a fact that, in order to save footage, a house manager has deliberately eliminated from the film the words "Directed by . . ."

In order to save footage, mark you, such elimination being, perhaps four seconds of time. This is not fair or just!

Heaven knows, the director has very little credit as it is. In many cases he takes a man or woman utterly incapable of any emotion—of any histrionic ability, endeavours to teach them to depict faithfully and truthfully scenes of life, and then sometimes he is also compelled to teach that same person every gesture, every facial expression, every move that he or she may make upon the screen.

Sometimes he will make of a plain-faced woman or man a Venus or an Adonis, as the case may be, and the public will say: "Wonderful! Isn't he (or she) marvellous? How I do love that star." But the man who has made this possible is eliminated for the want of space of a few seconds. The man whose brain has seen the possibilities of the production; who has constructed, developed and made possible a brilliant piece of work. Such a man is not allowed that few poor seconds of courtesy and public acknowledgment that recognition demands. Is this fair upon the part of the exhibitor?

Is it really not detrimental to the exhibitor in the long run? If a director is fortunate enough to place upon the screen a very worthy picture—and, perhaps, a masterpiece—is it not an asset to the exhibitor? If a certain picture becomes a great success, why not give the director who has made it possible the credit due to him. Make the director of such a picture known.

Another picture will grow under his skilful management. The director's name is mentioned. Instantly the public will recognise the merit of the production, and will say: "Oh, yes, I remember he directed such and such a picture. That was wonderful. We will go to see this one." Does not the director have much to do with the box-office receipts? I think he has.

I do not believe that the day of the star is doomed, but I do believe that only the biggest and best stars will remain. It will be the "survival of the fittest." The day of the mediocre and lesser star will in a short space of time pass away.

The day will come when the exhibitor will book his picture by the name of the director, the same as the publisher sells his books by the name of the author.

For instance, take the theatres. Twenty years ago—yes, even ten years ago—nine of ten plays were advertised and exploited under the name of the star. To-day it is nearly the reverse. So it will be in pictures. The theatres now mention the name of the author and the producer. Very soon pictures will feature the names of the director and the author in blazing electric lights.

An exhibitor who merely exploits the name of the star is really cutting his own throat. Stars get the high salaries; pictures cost more money and the exhibitor has to pay.

But, like everything else, I am sure that eventually the motion picture business will find its own level. Good stories, good, well-made productions, with the trade mark of a good director's name, will in the end bring more money to an exhibitor and be more pleasing to the public than high-priced, fanciful productions, whose only merit is an expensive star with a liberal amount of close-ups.

THE FILM ARTISTES' WORST ENEMY

Film artistes have much to contend with in their weary tramp along the pathway to stardom; the question that we have set some representative artistes is: "Who or What is the Worst Enemy?" And we intend to publish their replies in this and subsequent issues. In the meantime others are invited to contribute their opinion.

by DAVID GREY

Once upon a time there was a girl named Alys, spoken of by her friends, such as were not in the Profession, as a "Rising Young Artiste."

Many days work had she as a useful Small-part Artiste, for she was endowed with both the looks and the talent. And there came a day when she had "done something," for every British company of note.

With this proudly uppermost in her thoughts she interviewed a Director of her early acquaintance, who saw in her just what he had been looking for. But she, not being aware of this, was overjoyed to accept an "important engagement" at the figure which he named, together with the additional attraction of the valuable publicity which she might secure as a result thereof. She therefore acquired the services of a Publicity Expert, and, giving him a free hand, besides many photographs of herself in the costume of the period which the production represented, for the plot was some two hundred years of age and still going strong, she soon was known far and wide, with her picture in every periodical in the country.

And the Directors of the Kingdom saw, and made a note of, the Trade Show, when they could see this "New Star in our Midst."

The Great Day arrived and passed, and it was known that she had made good. The Directors saying each to his Casting Manager, such of them, that is, who filled not both offices themselves, "Behold, this wench is the very type for the role. Note well against the day when we ourselves may have just cause to 'do' a costume play, for she is the very thing."

And the Reviewers waxed eloquent, saying that the Character "fitted her quite well," and suchlike enthusiastic expressions.

So after a little while had passed in which she allowed herself to enjoy the fruits of her labour, she raised her salary and straightway sought employ. But now she found herself countered at every turn, for the gods of the studio having seen her deport well in one particular part could not picture her in any but a similar one; for they had her "fixed."

Thenceforth her "jobs" were confined to "similar ones," and they were few and far between. Until she found herself getting less of the needful than she had weeded before Her Great Work . . .

So all Rising Young Artistes—and there are many now that the Day of the British Picture is dawning; many who to-day unknown, will rise by their own perseverance and industry to the top of the tree—treat the Specialised Part with care, for it may be no sheep but only a skin covering a very wolfish adversary indeed. To be in the category of TYPE makes the upward path infinitely more rough and sometimes impossible, as in the case of Alys, who eventually gave it up and returned to her home in Nottingham, where she became plain "Alice, where's them dishes?" As it was in the beginning.

Intimate Studio Gossip

In announcing, in our last issue, the marriage of Harley Knoles and Rosina Henley, I never made known all the facts connected with the event, but reserved the most interesting fact for this week. The first news of the marriage was published last week; but the marriage took place on September 16 last year, and was kept secret till now!

* * *

Chatting to Walter West at the Club during the week, I gathered that his latest Violet Hopson production is now finished, and he is busy on plans for another three productions, which he will produce in March.

* * *

Guy Newall, who returned from his visit to the United States only a few weeks ago, now announces the title of the next item on the George Clark production program. It takes the form of an adaptation of Alfred Ollivant's novel "Boy Woodburn," and Ivy Duke will star as the heroine. The company leaves for the country early next week, and in order to make the locations coincide exactly with the descriptions in the book, a very fine old farm-house has been purchased and is being re-built in accordance with the farm described in the novel, around which the romance of "Boy Woodburn" takes place.

* * *

As the story deals with racing, the stables attached to the farm house have been specially stocked with thoroughbreds, and a very fine Argentine pony, which Guy Newall brought back with him from the United States specially for the film, will be the leading equine actor in the production. The lighting will be supplied by a lorry, specially designed and equipped to facilitate the filming of actual interiors.

With the completion of the scenario upon which he is now engaged, Eliot Stannard will have exactly twenty film plays to his credit, since he wrote his first "The Mystery of the Hansom Cab" for Ideal Films in 1915. One just completed, "The Master of Craft," by W. W. Jacobs, is now being made by Thomas Bentley, who has been having a rough time aboard a schooner during the past few days in directing a jolly crew of film comedians; another, "Mord Em'ly," the first of Pett Ridge's stories to be filmed, directed by George Pearson, was trade shown at the Alhambra last Friday afternoon. The filming of this story was, Mr. Stannard says, due to his accidental purchase and reading of the book, in which he saw screen possibilities. He took it to George Pearson and enthused him with the idea, and then brought about the meeting between Pett Ridge and Mr. Pearson, which resulted in the decision of Welsh-Pearson to film the story and to engage Mr. Stannard to write the scenario, which Pett Ridge said was quite a work of genius.

One of my visitors this week was Gertrude McCoy, who has just arrived back from Holland where she has been playing lead in "Thou Shalt Not" for Binger. She will now commence work with C. Aubrey Smith in "The Temptation of Carlton Earl," which Wilfred Noy is to direct for Aubrey Smith Theatres, Ltd., at the Stoll Studio. Miss McCoy is one of the most accomplished artistes we have in this country, and it is my hope that the future will see her gracing more of our studio activities.

After a fairly lengthy absence from this country Cecil M. Hepworth and Alma Taylor have returned. He tells me that he does not "for the moment" contemplate producing pictures in America. So now we know!

An organisation known as the Faculty of Arts has decided to grant diplomas and medals for British films of outstanding merit. The aim of the Faculty, which has a sister organisation in the States, is, I am told, to develop the arts and crafts of the country as a national asset. Its address is 4, Spring Street, Paddington, W.C.2.

Of all the psychological problems commend me to George Pearson. Here is a man with a string of successful productions to his name, recognised as a film genius, and with his popularity among all who know or have heard of him firmly established. And yet, at the conclusion of the Trade show of "Mord Em'ly," with everybody crowding round and complimenting him, and with congratulations showering in on him, I found him in the throes of pessimism and depression. "The most awful period in a man's life," he remarked, "are the five minutes after his picture has been Trade shown." While inclined to agree, yet I do feel that Mr. Pearson has nothing to reproach himself for. His work is of highest merit. He is a great man—but then, of course, truly great men are never satisfied with their work. Hence Mr. Pearson's discontent.

C. Tilson-Chowne suffered a sad loss during the past few days. News came, while the festivities of the Club Opening Night were in full swing, of the death of his father. Mr. Chowne, senr., had suffered from paralysis for some time, and succumbed to his third stroke on January 22. Our sympathies to C. Tilson-Chowne in his bereavement.

Last Friday I was one of the number who crowded the Criterion Roof Garden, and there met a whole host of famous film and stage folk. Everyone was in fancy dress. The presentation of prizes was by Lady Diana Manners. Among those present were Maurice Elvey, Madge Stuart, A. E. W. Mason, Queenie Thomas, Bertram Phillips, Kenelm Foss, Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Blackton, the Hon. Lois Sturt, Alice Crawford, Moyna MacGill, Joan Morgan, Sidney Morgan, Hilda Bayley, Florence Turner, Denison Clift, Leslie Henson and Madge Saunders.

I learn that R. J. Cullen, of the staff of Famous Players-Lasky British Producers, has received an official notification from the Independence of Montenegro that he has been invested with the Order of Prince Danilo I. "for gracious services rendered to the Montenegrin Government." The order carries with it the privilege of using the title "Chevalier." Mr. Cullen, who has been intimately associated with the British industry since the old London days under George Loane Tucker, recently accompanied Mr. George Fitzmaurice and his company in the capacity of business manager to Italy, where the exteriors were filmed for the great director's forthcoming Paramount Production "The Man from Home."

ROBBIE BURNS KNEW !

Rex Davis explains the ordeal of seeing himself as others see him

A CARD came by post. I was invited to the "private Trade performance" at the Belgravia Kinema at 11.15 in the morning. And the card intimated that the film featured (—).

Blank was myself.

There was a touch of spring in the air. I felt more inclined to go into the park than into the kinema, but I could not resist the desire to sit among the exhibitors, their ladies and their ladies' friends upon whose judgment so much depends. So I went and took a seat at the back of the circle.

Sitting near me was a lady whose "toilette" and accent suggested Brixton. She was saying: "This is the first time I've been to one of these shows. I know the manager of our Picture Palace, and he gave me the ticket, but judging by the class of person here I don't think I shall care much about it."

I shuddered and wished the orchestra would begin—then I noticed just in front of me, seated beside an elegant mother, was a very pretty girl. It may have been the touch of spring in the air, but she reminded me of a sprig of apple blossom, and I fell to wondering who had given her a ticket.

Taking a furtive glance round, my eyes fell with a tremor on the gentlemen of the Press seated near by, one of whom at the moment was leaning across talking to another scribe. What were they going to write?

Once again I shuddered and wished the orchestra would begin. At that moment the heroine, the girl who played "opposite" me in the film, floated in, accompanied by her substance young man, whilst her shadow young man, with a stump of pencil, a piece of paper with a column headed "Don't's," was preparing to sit in judgment on himself.

The two snuggled into their seats, the lights were considerate enough to go out, the orchestra began, and I realised with a catch in the breath and a dreadful sinking down-stairs that I was going to be one of those "tae see oorsels as ithers see us," and I made a rapid calculation as to how long it was before I appeared.

To every one of my Trade shows always comes an unwavering supporter—my old nurse, ever so Irish, ever so proud of it, and ever so blind to my imperfections. No matter how severe those grim gentlemen of the Press are, she always contrives to cover the plumage of her goose with a swan's down mantle, but she doesn't sit with me now, for once in a scene where I was severely rough-handled by villains, her indignation was so righteous that she nearly got ejected for creating a disturbance. So I knew she would not disappoint me, and she didn't, for as I came on she applauded louder, an example which a few sitting near kindly followed.

This was not going to be so bad.

And so again I found myself in two places at the same time; and the mumming and the mouthing and the mimicking had begun. It seemed to me, with a maximum of endeavour I was obtaining a minimum of effect, and my "Don't's" column began to fill with notes of things to be averted—future production.

Then came my love scene.

I thought it passably pretty: an attractive little leafy glade, with a brook, and the sun working overtime; and then quite suddenly out of the darkness I heard the voice of Miss Apple Blossom softly murmuring, "Mumsie, I'm sure those two must really care for each other —."

Oh! for the romance of Apple Blossom. Had she but known that less than half a bow shot away, under the kindly cloak of darkness, one of the two was snuggling close to that substance which could never be changed for the shadow. And so with a half-sigh for the pink-and-white dreams of apple blossom I addressed myself again to my overcrowded "Don't's" column.

It needed very little instinct to tell me two brother artistes were in confabulation close by: "Why ever did they cast him for the part—not a bit like it—not the type. Now, when I was playing in —"

Mercifully the orchestra, which all the time had been delightful, broke into a delicious refrain. What would Trade shows, or anything else, be without music? Anyway, it soothed my savage breast.

Looking back at the screen, I felt what a difficult job ours is. There is no second bite at the cherry; what's done cannot be undone; there it is, down in black and white—generally, I felt, as evidence against one—but there is no accommodating little piece of india rubber at the end of the pencil to eradicate the mistakes.

I leant back, and a voice unmistakably from the slopes of Israel was saying, "Vell, if I make you an offer of a hundred down, vot'll you do?"

"Count it!" was the chosen racial ready retort, and for the first time during the proceedings I smiled.

As the picture ended I wished I'd done this, or not done that. Up went the lights, and fragments of conversation, like chaff in the wind, floated by:

"How d'ye like it?" "Not half bad; got a winner, I think." "What do you think of the leads?"

I pushed on and passed the director surrounded by a host of congratulating friends, and I suppose all was well with his world. I felt glad, for he is an excellent fellow. At the doors there was a congestion, and again I was an unwilling eavesdropper. A very up-to-date damsel was saying to another advanced amazon: "I know, dear, you'll scream at me, but give me a priceless Punch and Judy show."

To this her companion cooed: "I know, dear; or a jolly old murder trial." And I wished, how I wished, I'd heard Miss Apple Blossom telling her elegant mumsie what she preferred.

I stumbled out into the crisp, bright sunshine, but I'd neither crispness, brightness, nor sunshine. London, in a kaleidoscopic way, was hurrying by to lunch, but I didn't feel hungry, and pulled up at the corner of the street, and wondered if I'd better give up film acting and go in for breeding rabbits, when suddenly I was clutched vigorously by the arm; there was my ever so Irish nurse, and—oh, oh—she was covering me with the swan's down mantle.

ON OUR FRONT COVER

A strong dramatic story is unfolded in the new picture in course of production at the Haarlem studios, and the question arises as to what lengths a mother is justified in going to save her child from a terrible fate. "Thou Shalt Not" shows the yearning of the childless mother; the love that can spring up even for an adopted child, which has been nurtured and cared for from babyhood. Gertrude McCoy plays the dramatic role of the mother in "Thou Shalt Not," and to save her child even stoops to murder the man who would take her away—a degraded, drunken specimen of manhood, but the child's real father. But Fate steps in, and the finale is as dramatic as it is surprising. Gertrude McCoy has some strong moments with her film husband (Paul d'Groot) and with her life-long friend (played by Hugh Willoughby), the biggest scene of all, however, being with Jan Mus, a famous Dutch artiste, who plays the drink-sodden father of the child. "Thou Shalt Not" will shortly be presented to the British Trade by Maurice Binger, and is being directed by George Beranger.

The dramatic feminine lead in "Thou Shalt Not" is played by beautiful Gertrude McCoy, who has had an extraordinarily varied experience in film studios all over the globe. One of Miss McCoy's earliest recollections is made up of the old Biograph days, and it was the great D. W. Griffith who "made up" her face for her first screen appearance. Another interesting memory is that of playing co-star with Mary Pickford in "The Peach Basket Hat."

Born in Georgia, Gertrude McCoy left her home at a very early age, with bad stage fever, but soon found her way to the "movies," which she has never left since. Tall, with blue eyes and fair hair, she is an imposing figure. She played for Biograph, Edison, Famous-Players, Pathé and Gaumont in America, and for Broadwest ("Christine Johnstone" and British Actors' ("Burnt In").

Recently she took a trip to South Africa, where she played lead in "Sam's Kid"; now she is enjoying a stay in tulip town playing an emotional role in which her long and varied experience should stand her in good stead. Gertrude McCoy is the wife of Duncan McRae, the well-known film director.

Zoe Palmer, one of the youngest and prettiest of our leading juveniles, is back in Holland once more, playing the ingenue lead in the new production from the Hollandia Studios, "Thou Shalt Not." In one novel scene she appears to a Chinaman in a dream, as a beauteous Chinese maiden, wearing an ancient and valuable Eastern robe, and further undergoes the thrilling experience of being kidnapped by Chinamen in Limehouse.

Although still in her early 'teens, Zoe is quite an experienced little film lady, and will be remembered as the attractive heroine in "The Black Tulip" and in various roles in "The Other Person," "Walls of Prejudice," numerous Gaumont Comedies, a series of Song Pictures for Masters and in "Meg's Children" for Seal.

She has just become engaged to be married to Arthur Wilson, a young naval officer, but tells us that she is not giving up her screen work after her marriage, which will not take place for some time.

Lewis Willoughby is considered one of the finest dramatic actors of the British screen, and has gained much of his experience in American studios, although a Britisher. A fine, handsome presence, he is equally at home in straight or character roles.

AN ALLIANCE ALLIANCE

A few days ago a charming scene was enacted at the Alliance Studios, at St. Margaret's-on-Thames, and made an occasion for much congratulation. Harley Knoles, as we announced in our last issue, has just become married to Rosina Henley (a niece of the famous English poet—W. E. Henley), and his colleagues at the studios and head office presented the happy pair with a heavy silver salver to mark the event.

N. Walker made the presentation, and testified to the staff's best wishes and heartiest congratulations. The salver was engraved as follows:—

To Mr. and Mrs. Harley Knoles, on the occasion of their marriage, as a token of esteem and respect, from their associates in Alliance Film Corporation, Limited.

Leo. F. Johnstone, the Secretary of Alliance Film Corporation, Ltd., in presenting a floral tribute to Mrs. Knoles, said that her husband was known for the careful consideration he gave to casting his plays, and, in selecting Miss Henley for the rôle of Mrs. Knoles, he was more than maintaining his reputation.

Harley Knoles, on rising to reply, was received with much applause. He desired to thank the staff for the gift, and also for their loyalty and co-operation in the work of the studios, and he was proud to call them friends. Without their help in the various departments, the acknowledged success they had achieved would not have been possible. They were a combined and happy staff to work with, enthusiastic to score bigger successes every time.

Record of Activities of Kine-Cameramen

CUTTING THE COST

THERE is a move to cut down the wages being paid to studio cameramen. This is slowly but surely becoming more evident. Already one firm has started to cut, and it is only with the greatest difficulty that it is succeeding in getting down the present wage.

It is all very well to start wage cutting at this time of the year when there is a great deal of unemployment, but later on, when production firms start getting busy again, those who cut the wages will find themselves losing the better cameramen.

Cameramen are beginning to wake up to the danger of this wage-cutting business, and so strongly are the cameramen banded together that they can, without strikes or such like, assert their rights and safeguard their positions.

Good cameramen refuse the lower wages because they realise that if they can stay out against it long enough they are bound to get the salary they demand. A firm which engages a cameraman because he is cheap, will surely find out its folly before many weeks are past.

It will realise then the difference that a cameraman can make to a film; it will realise that the cameraman is the man upon whom the success of a picture depends; that he can make or mar a film. Then they will be only too glad to get the other man back at a higher wage.

The cameraman who is willing to sell his work cheaply can never be regarded by his employer with the same satisfaction that the employer derives from a man who puts a higher value on his work. It is only human for a man to think that because he has purchased something cheaply that it cannot be of much value. Therefore, the man who goes around undercutting his fellow-cameramen will begin to be regarded by the employers as a bad photographer and will lose many friends in the Trade.

The cameramen can combat this menace by banding together. There should be no attempt to undercut each other, for not only do such tactics do harm to themselves, but every cameraman in the business will suffer in the long run. To a fair reduction no one objects, but the reductions at present suggested are out of all proportion with the fall in the cost of living.

The cameramen have it in their own hands. If they go about it in the right way they will win through. If they let the drastic cuts be made, then there will be other cuts to follow, and the name that it has taken the cameramen years to built up will be lost and once more they will become mechanics—mere handle turners.

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

AN interesting lecture takes place at the K.C.S., on Wednesday next. P. Dennis, one of the newest members, will speak on the subjects of toning and laboratory practice. Mr. Dennis is an expert in dark room work, so that his talk should be of particular interest.

It is always pleasing to see new members joining the society. During the last few weeks there has been quite a number of cameramen joining up and the meetings are becoming well attended.

It was decided at the last meeting that in future the cameramen should address each other as Brother. It was suggested that the constant use of the word would perhaps have the effect of getting a spirit of brotherhood into the Society. Auto suggestion could work wonders and by using the word "brother" they would come to regard each other as such. Only one objection was raised, by a member who suggested that the word would merely become a figure of speech and would not help matters any.

A letter from the K.C.S. is to be sent to George Ploughman, sympathising with him in the accident he recently met with.

EVENT OF THE WEEK

SELDOM has a cameraman been up against more obstacles than Kenneth Gordon was last Friday night. The Criterion gave a fancy dress ball to well-known film stars and Gordon was sent along to film it for Pathé's.

With the aid of two Sunlight arcs and some banks of mercury vapour the revelry was filmed. Gordon had all his work cut out to get photos of many of the impromptu incidents that occurred.

Then the big snow fight provided him with more excitement than he required. Some people present seemed to take particular care to see that the snowballs fell on or around the camera and so, with snowballs—artificial ones—crashing around Gordon bravely cranked away.

Leslie Henson proved one of Gordon's most elusive victims, and it was only by stalking Henson round about that Gordon could get a pictorial record of his activities.

The revelry continued until a very late hour, but it gave Gordon plenty of opportunities for getting a lot of intimate photographs of famous film stars at play. Seldom, if ever, has there been such an array of stars in one picture, and I doubt if there will ever again be such an all-star east shown on the film, that is, at least, not until the first Kinema Club production is made.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

Last week a flashlight photograph of the Kinema Club opening was published on one of the other pages of this paper. Alfred Moses, of Stoll, is responsible for it. As a result of his endeavours with the flash-powder on the opening night he has now got a very badly burned hand. The night of the opening was, it will be remembered, a very foggy one—so Mr. Moses' photograph is quite good considering the fog that was in the room at the time.

Charlie Heath was filming a hunt in Ireland last week. He photographed the start of the hunt and then set out in a car until he came upon the stag swimming up a stream, to make the hounds lose the scent. Heath had his camera out and actually got a photograph of the stag being chased, he having found it long before the hounds. When the hounds did arrive they were unable to pick up the scent, and, being within 200 yards of their kennels, they returned home and refused to budge out again.

A letter from George Ploughman states that he is now a little bit better after his smash-up in the Belgium Congo. Letters should be addressed to him c/o Lecture Films, 4, Bloomsbury Place, W.C.1.

A. Kingston, who is still working on the photographing of sound, has a talking picture in his possession, recently taken, of Sir Ernest Shackleton making a speech. It should prove valuable to Kingston.

A St. Brown, Will Kellino's cameraman, is an expert billiard player. Last week at the club he was in particularly good form, and I saw him make a number of very big breaks. He has just finished turning on the latest Gaumont production, the title of which is being announced shortly.

T. Scales has returned from Egypt, where he has secured a number of scoops for the Pathé Gazette. Scales has been doing a lot of travelling lately, having made one trip to America and back, another to Egypt, and a few other places too numerous to mention.

Will somebody assist a number of worried cameramen—why they should worry I do not know. They entered into an argument the other night about the De Brie camera, and not one of the eight men there could tell how many oil-holes there are in a De Brie; some say nine, some say less, but nobody seems to know the exact number.

There should be plenty of work for cameramen when Princess Mary is married on February 28. The topical firms are all making elaborate preparations for the event. And they will, no doubt, require a number of extra men on the job.

I have just seen the first issue of a new house organ being issued by the Topical Budget. One of the most amusing items in the issue is a cartoon showing Topical men at work. There are also a number of other cartoons, photographs and articles, which all make interesting reading matter.

NOT "THE TYPE"

by MAISIE MARCELLE

You awaken in the morning
Feeling ready for the day;
You've powdered, scented, and appear
In very best array;
Then start your rounds by calling on
The famous Sidney Jay.

You gallop up the creaking stairs:
When he sees you appear
He murmurs: "No, you're not the type,
I'm very sorry, dear.
We wanted dark girls yesterday;
Now, why were you not here?"

So, cheerily you turn to go,
As if you did not care.
"I'll go along to Walthamstow, Perhaps they'll want me there."
When you inquire you're gently told
They only need a bear.

You wander on, in sheer disgust,
And then a pal you meet.
She says they want someone like you Along at Rupert Street.
"You're sure to get the part, my dear, You're looking awfully sweet."

At last you reach the office door,
And murmur timidly:
"Miss Got-Thebird has told me
You want someone just like me."
A man yells out: "You're just too late,
We close from two to three."

"But listen, miss," he whispers,
About to start a chat;
"I hear they're needing crowds along
At number twenty flat."
You call at number twenty, where You're told you're much too fat.

To try to get a "heavy" part
You seriously begin.
The doorkeeper says solemnly:
"I cannot let you in.
The lady must weigh fifteen stone;
I fear you're much too thin."

When home, at last, you start to sup
On Gorgonzola ripe,
A little beer, your heart to cheer,
And onions à la tripe.
In bed, upstairs, you say your prayers:
"PLEASE, GOD, MAKE ME THE TYPE."

Write to the HON. GENERAL SECRETARY

C L U B C L A T T E R

by CLATTERBOX

The worst instance of club clatter was heard last week, when the lift broke and smashed four dozen plates!

And what everybody is wanting to know is exactly what unutterable (and unprintable) words were accounted for by George Ridg-well's purple face when he was called from a game of bridge to argue a lady member into recognising the rule that her child could not be admitted to the Club.

The Executive Committee has received a rude shock to its paternal pride. It had persuaded itself that there was nothing in London that could compete for attractiveness with the Club. Last week Phillip Hewland set out from his home for the Club. There was a breakdown on the tube. He got out and walked. En route he passed a church. The organ was playing. The choir was singing hymns. Evidently unable to withstand the day, February 26. At present there will only be accommodation for 48 players, and those desirous of joining at the tables should hand their names to the Secretary at once.

The tickets for the whist drive are 2s. 6d.
each, and the prizes (in cash) will be proportionate to the amount subscribed. On Sunday, February 19, another concert will be held. Members should keep Saturdays and Sundays open for the purpose of spending jolly evenings.

By the time these words appear in print Membership Cards and Books of Rules will have been sent off to all members, who are instructed to make themselves conversant with the rules, as ignorance will not be accepted as an excuse for breaches. Particularly is the attention of members drawn to Rule ix.
par. (e), in which it is made a penal offence for any member to approach a director for the purpose of soliciting an engagement.

I have heard considerable discussion among the members on the lounges as to the ladies' rooms on the third floor. Some want them thrown open to men members and others desire them kept as they are. It will be interesting to watch developments.

BRIGHTER LONDON

By FRED A KAYE.

Some folks say London is so dull,
One might as well reside in Hull.
This statement may be true or not,
It can't apply to us—we've got
Our Club.

On Sundays we would once have said:
There's nothing doing, we'll stay in bed.
But now we rise, nor heed the skies,
And haste along to where Time flies—
Our Club.

In converse gay we sit all day;
The evenings brightened up with play.
Oh! London's anything but dull:
I'll bet they wish they had in Hull
Our Club.

attraction Phillip entered. And there he remained. The Club saw him not, that night!

During the week the Club has been visited by several prominent people, including our Vice-President, Colonel H. C. Bromhead, who lunched here with Reginald Bromhead and Bernard Bromhead. Other visitors included
Major Bell (F.P.-Lasky) and Walter West.

The General Secretary asks me to announce to-night (Saturday) there will be a Club dance for members only. The dance will commence at 8.30 p.m. and end at 12.0 a.m. and will be preceded by a special à la carte dance-dinner served at 6.30 p.m., at the usual prices. There will be no charge for admission to the dancing, the music for which will be supplied by a jazz band.

To-morrow (Sunday) evening at 8.30 an informal concert is being organised by Harry Worth and the Entertainments Committee.
This will be held immediately after dinner in the general lounge, and an excellent musical program is being arranged. Members are urged to attend these functions, as they have been arranged with the idea of providing members with appropriate entertainment in their own Club.

For the month of February a comprehensive syllabus has been arranged by the Entertainments Committee, of which Rex Davis is a capable chairman. On each Saturday a dance will be held; particulars of the dances on February 11, 18 and 25 will be announced later. On Sunday, February 12, a whist drive is being arranged and another on Sun-

SCREEN VALUES

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"Mord Em'ly."

Welsh-Pearson—Starring Betty Balfour and Rex Davis—Directed by George Pearson—Scenario by Eliot Stannard—Photography by Emile Lauste.

ALL engaged on this production have combined to make the best British film of the week. It makes a fit mate to those other products of the same stable, although there are defects which tend to mar the production and detract from its possible excellence.

George Pearson again reveals himself as an artiste. His direction obtains from his players the best that is within them. Certain isolated incidents are wonderful pieces of screencraft. The fight scene has been excellently staged and the crowd well handled; but the introduction of Betty Balfour into every scene throughout the production is sometimes at the expense of the continuity.

Certainly Betty Balfour is a comedienne of the most refined type, but her too frequent appearances tend to overweight the play. Her movements and manner are excellent for the type of work, but her facial expressions are not delicately mobile enough to depict those soul-emotions so necessary to a stirring drama of East End life.

Rex Davis scores a great hit, despite the fact that his opportunities are not of the best. He is an athlete and an actor; these two qualities he combines to great effect.

Elise Craven fails in her part, but Edward Sorley submits an excellent performance.

Pett Ridge's novel ought to have made a better scenario than it appears to have done. In the process of conversion from book to script the drama has been reduced to a minimum, and in its place a somewhat belaboured character study is offered.

The technical properties of the production—lighting, sets and photography—are beyond reproach. Emile Lauste has done his best work with production; he stands revealed as a kine-cameraman of the highest rank.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Artistic and good.

LEADS: Very good.

SUPPORTS: Excellently cast and played.

LITERARY: Defective.

INTERIORS: Adequate.

EXTERIORS: Well chosen

LIGHTING: Commendable.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Highest quality.

"Sinister Street."

Ideal—Featuring Maudie Dunham, Amy Verity and John Stuart—Directed by George Beranger—Scenario by George Beranger and A. Q. Walton—Photography by William Shenton.

GEORGE BERANGER and A. Q. Walton were given an exceedingly difficult task when they were told to adapt "Sinister Street" to the screen. The film bears only a very slight resemblance to the original story, for it would be impossible to have made a film of it otherwise.

For the most part the acting is bad and exaggerated, but this seems to be more the director's fault than the artistes'.

John Stuart has been badly handled with the result that he is very unnatural. He gives promise, however, of better work, if given a proper opportunity.

Amy Verity gives the best piece of characterisation; a highly successful screen career is assured for her. Maudie Dunham is lifeless.

The best has been made of the scenario, but "Sinister Street" is a difficult book to translate to the screen. The situations have not been well explained and the sub-titles have been too liberally handed out.

William Shenton can be depended upon to get good photographic results. Those who see his work in this film will not be disappointed in him.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION.—Uneven.

LEADS.—Of average quality, with Amy Verity outstanding.

SUPPORTS.—Adequate.

LITERARY.—Continuity and scenario are both up to standard.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—Good.

LIGHTING.—Good.

EXTERIORS.—Good.

"Tense Moments with Great Authors."

Masters—Featuring well-known stage stars—Directed by George Wynne, W. Courtenay Rowden and H. B. Parkinson—Photographed by Theodore Thumwood.

MASTERS has put out another series of novel films, which will become as popular as the Song series. Each picture has been well directed and gives no impression of haste or incompleteness.

Lyn Harding gives a fine performance as Svengali, Hilda Moore is excellent as Sappho, Ivan Berlyn's acting as Fagan is beyond reproach, and Ethel Irving in "La Tosca" gives another wonderful exhibition of histrionic ability.

The scenarios have been well written and the story is cleverly worked up to the big scene.

There is not, as might be expected, a too abundant use of sub-titles.

The photography and lighting, by Theodore Thumwood, is of a very high standard.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION.—First-rate.

LEADS.—Excellent.

SUPPORTS.—Of a high standard.

LITERARY.—Scenarios well written.

INTERIORS.—Adequate.

EXTERIORS.—Adequate.

LIGHTING.—Very good.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—Admirable.

"ALICE IN FILMLAND"

by HUGH E. WRIGHT.

Hugh E. Wright, in addition to his recognised histrionic ability, is a skilled wielder of the pen. By the courtesy of the Actor we are able to reproduce, in serial form, one of Hugh's literary effusions.

CHAPTER VI.

"Now a little powder, and you're absolutely the real thing," he went on, powdering her face with a very dirty powder puff. "Wasn't I the real thing before?" asked Alice, when she had got sufficient powder out of her mouth to use it for speaking with.

"Nothing like it!" said the little Comedian. "And I'll give you a tip; if you want to be a success on the kinema, be natural. Come along!" And he trotted her out to the Director again.

Then—as Alice said to her sister afterwards—everything seemed to happen all at once, backwards, with long waits between the bits.

The Director made her do all the things she'd ever done in Wonderland, all in the wrong order, and whenever she began to be interested in a bit, he told her to "fade out." Every time she was natural, he told her to act, and every time she acted, he said, "For God's sake be natural!" It seemed to go on for months and months. She came out of rooms, weeks before she had gone into them; she got up from the table before she had sat down at it; and all the time the little Comedian hovered round her, giving her bits of advice.

"Always remember what you wear," he said once.

"How can I?" said Alice, almost in tears. "I believe I've even forgotten who I am!"

And the waiting! The dreadful, dismal, deadly waiting between the bits! They waited for the sun to come out, and when it came out, there wasn't any film in the camera, so they waited for it to go in again; they waited for the Director; they waited for the Cameraman; they waited for everything and everybody. Once they actually waited for Alice, who had been forgotten in a corner somewhere. They must have waited a long time, Alice thought, for when they did find her, the Director had learned a whole lot of new words Alice had never even heard before.

And the Director altered so. Once he'd seemed quite friendly, Alice thought, but later, when she asked him why "Iris" didn't come, when he kept on calling for her, he snapped her up and said: "Oh, for the Lord's sake mind your own business. If everybody minded their own business in this world, we'd get on quicker."

"If Christopher Columbus had minded his own business," said Alice, "you'd never have been discovered. And I wish he had, so there!"

However, there is an end to everything, and one day the Director came to her and said: "That's the last bit. All we've got to do now is to cut you and join you up, and then I reckon we got the World's masterpiece."

Alice went back to her little room—she had a room of her own now—with a sense of relief. Of course, being cut and joined up sounded painful, but in this queer world things often weren't so bad as they sounded, and she was getting quite philosophical.

As she went into her room, she saw a bottle on the table facing her. She picked it up curiously. On the label were the words, "DRINK ME!" in capital letters.

Of course, with Alice's experience in Wonderland and Filmland, there was only one thing to be done. She did it.

(To be continued.)

"HOW ARTISTES SPOIL THEMSELVES"

Referring to the article by Max Roma in the Club Number under the above heading, Stephen Wing, an artiste, writes:—

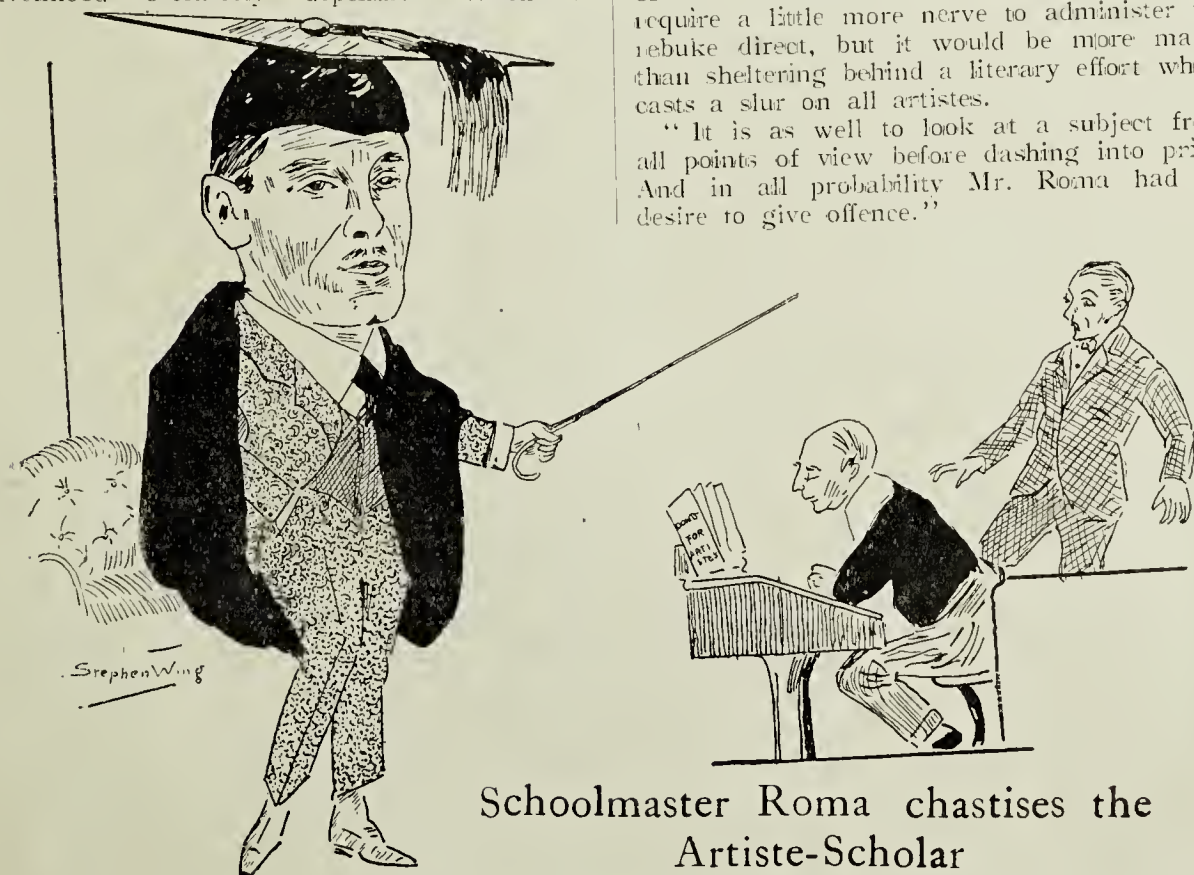

"From friends representative of all sections of the profession I have gathered that an agent steps without his province in administering a rebuke to those upon whom his livelihood ostensibly depends. When a person generalises it is difficult to refute these aspersions without calling down the old adage about the cap that fits.

"Nevertheless, we think that office notices are preferable to journalistic jaunts.

"Another remedy in the agent's hands is a polite, but firm, request that these displays of bad form be not indulged in. It may require a little more nerve to administer the rebuke direct, but it would be more manly than sheltering behind a literary effort which casts a slur on all artistes.

"It is as well to look at a subject from all points of view before dashing into print. And in all probability Mr. Roma had no desire to give offence."

Mr. DENISON CLIFT.

PRODUCE BRITISH STORIES IN BRITAIN

by Denison Clift.

Mr. Clift, in a recent address upon the future of British film production, said:—

"Britain has every resource and every opportunity to place her in the forefront of world picture-production. The imaginative brains of the world are here—the great novelists and dramatists. What magic in the names of Galsworthy, Shaw, Pinero, Henry Arthur Jones, Barrie; and among the novelists, Conan Doyle, Anthony Hope, Gilbert Parker, Kipling, and others equally great! Some of these master-minds have been captured by American film companies, and are now creating stories direct for American production. What is wrong with British enterprise that they are not writing direct for British production?

"Stories like 'The Admirable Crichton,' 'The Little Minister,' 'Peter Pan,' 'The Right of Way,' 'The Silver King,' 'Mrs. Dane's Defence,' and 'Mid-Channel,' being British in temperament, atmosphere and viewpoint, should be made in Britain to preserve their original native strength and flavour. British technique must advance so that the standard of production here will make the English versions of such subjects unsurpassed in the international market."

Mr. Clift has selected his future subjects in England according to these convictions. They are—

"MARY QUEEN of SCOTS."

This picture, with Fay Compton as the ill-fated queen, will enthral with its historic imagination, its glowing colour, its crashing speed. It will be filmed on the actual scenes of the story—in Scotland, at Holyrood, Fotheringay, and Lochleven.

"DIANA of the CROSSWAYS."

Is now in production for Ideal Films, Ltd., with an all-star British cast of distinction. The real "Crossways" will be pictured, and much of the action of the story will be filmed on locations described by George Meredith in his world-wide famous novel.

"A BILL of DIVORCEMENT."

This popular success of both the London and New York stage will be directed by Mr. Clift for Ideal Films, Ltd., with a British cast of great excellence, and will be distinguished in the new series of—

William Desmond Taylor.

WITH the special significance for the conditions in Los Angeles which the murder of William Desmond Taylor has, we are not concerned. It is the loss of an Englishman who was an outstanding figure in production which we deplore. Taylor was by birth Irish, by education English, and by temperament international. Still a young man—for he was only forty-five at the time of his death—Taylor had had a life more full than is granted to most men. When he was barely nineteen he took to the stage in face of family opposition, and played in "The Private Secretary." He was young when he went to Canada, and there seems to have been everything—business man, gold-miner, backwoodsman, traveller. His screen career began with Ince, and he worked later for Vitagraph, Favourite Players, Morosco, Pallas (for whom he directed "The Parson of Panamint," amongst other pictures), Fox (where he directed "The Tale of Two Cities"), and Artcraft, in which he was Mary Pickford's director, and produced "How Could You, Jean?" and "Captain Kidd, Junr." He joined the Canadian Air Force during the war, and, coming to this side, saw service in France up to the Armistice. It was about May, 1919, when he returned to America and joined Famous Players, directing "Huckleberry Finn" and other films. He was the president of the M.P.D.A., and had directed at some time or another most of the stars. The names of Betty Compson, Ethel Clayton, Agnes Ayres, Elsie Ferguson, Constance Talmadge, Vivian Martin, Louise Huff, and Mary Pickford come to mind offhand. He had a strange career, and he was a likeable man, and, though the ghouls who are raking over the ashes of his dead past may find ugly things, let us remember of him one thing and forget the rest—his art.

More Production.

IF only half the current rumours are true, there will be a lot more picture making in the near future than there has been in the recent past. Guy Newall has begun, Donald Crisp is credited with intentions, the Robertsons likewise, Samuelson is declared to be starting again, all the regular producing organisations will soon be again at work, and there are stories of new developments and expanded finance. So long as the tendency is upwards to bigger ideas, better pictures and broader minds, there is no reason why this country should not be definitely put on the map as a maker of world-pictures. There is a way in which it can be done, a way which is both simple and hard. It is by making pictures for the world instead of only for the home market. It is the difference between true economics and false economy.

Anglo-Saxonism.

IN the past a tradition has arisen which has revealed itself in the thoughtless remark: "When you make films, make them with an appeal to the American public." The idea being that for a production to sell in America it must possess definite and distinct Americanese. This is a half-truth. The whole truth is this: British, Americans and Colonials are all of the Anglo-Saxon race, and have identical likes and dislikes. There is no very pronounced difference between the British and American preferences and prejudices; therefore there is no necessity to make films with a distinctive American or distinctive British or distinctive Colonial appeal. Wherever the Anglo-Saxon race is (and this means 80 per cent. of the world's film markets) there is the same humanity, there are the same deep inherent emotions and sentiment. To capture the whole Anglo-Saxon market, film-producing units must appeal straight to the heart of the typical Anglo-Saxon. And the typical Anglo-Saxon prefers, in his entertainment, a little excitement, a little thrill, a little romance, but a great deal of real-life human interest. True, the American is a trifle more superficial in his emotions—they are more readily stirred and his sentiment more easily agitated—than the stolid, solid Britisher, but it can be taken as an established fact that the simple sentiments of the human heart are the same wherever the English tongue is spoken. Producing units need to make high-quality films that will overcome the criticism of the most captious Britisher, and he will find that such films will also please the critical American.

"Open Arms" and a Closed Mind.

THERE is, as some people in the studios may be aware, an organisation in America called the Selznick Company. It produces pictures. Sometimes they are rather good pictures. It also produces other things. For example, Myron Selznick was recently over here on a visit and looked after by Louis Brock. And it is a pity that Brock did not go on looking after little Selznick when he got back to the States, if only to save him opening his mouth so wide, that he put both feet and half his body in it. According to the M.P. World, a reputable American trade paper, Myron says that England is an impossible place in which to produce pictures, and that there are not locations or scenes which lend themselves particularly to the making of pictures. Of course, we haven't any Barbary Coast or Bowery, nor even a Los Angeles—thank Heaven!—but even this poor little island has a few beauty spots. But maybe they don't measure up to Myron's æsthetic taste.

And From Them . . . !

MYRON says, too, that there's a lot of feeling here against America, and especially against American films. No, little one, the feeling, such as it is, is against bad films, wherever they come from. Of course, as most films come from the United States, that country gets the biggest share of knocks. But that's the price of empire, Myron. Another thing he says is that as we cannot outdo America, we are anxious to see someone else do so, and that in consequence our producers are welcoming German films with open arms. Really, Myron must be a queer dog. If he objects to being so described, we withdraw the dog, because he'll grow. In passing, we wonder just how many British pictures he has seen, how many British directors he has talked to, and—well, generally, what he knows about it, anyway.

"A GOD IN PAIN"

Henderson Bland Champions the Cause of Kinemas

M. Diaghileff, in the Observer of January 29, had some hard things to say about the kinema. M. Diaghileff comes along and tells me that he thinks it is beyond contempt and that it is "threatened, like the Tango and other fashions, with perishing!"

But is it perishing? I venture to think not. It is slumbering on its strong right arm, and I believe that it will wake like a god in pain and throw off the vulgar and absurd shackles that encumber it to-day. It will rise to rank with an art so important as the Russian Ballet.

Tolstoy in his wonderful book, "What is Art?" quotes over a hundred definitions of art from the greatest writers, and none of them quite agree, so I will not attempt a definition. Talking of the routine of the kinema, M. Diaghileff says:—"It was necessary to have Titans like Wagner, Debussy and Moussorgsky to devote their lives to fighting against this theatrical routine. And with the present condition of the kinema I cannot calculate the dimensions of the Titans whom it would be necessary to engage for a similar combat."

Let us invite such Titans as M. Diaghileff, Leon Bakst, and Eugene Goossens into the arena to help us out of the morass into which we have fallen. Think of the thousands spent on certain productions and then think of the results. Any fool can see that they are not works of art—can see that they are hopelessly inartistic. M. Diaghileff has two ugly flings at two recently exhibited films. One I did not see, the other I saw in the company of a well-known dramatist who knows both the French and English drama, and we both agreed that the scene "where a lady floats on a block of ice" was one of the most stupendous things ever seen in a theatre. The story of the film is an old, old story, but so for that matter is the story of "The Sleeping Princess," with perhaps a little more age to its credit. It is the handling of the story that matters. M. Diaghileff knows that as well as Shakespeare knew it when he was handling some of his sorry plots.

M. Diaghileff says:—"The kinema should be a great medium for artistic propaganda." Quite so, but why drag in propaganda? What might not D. W. Griffith working in co-operation with such men as M. Diaghileff and Leon Bakst accomplish? M. Diaghileff says:—"Unless the kinema becomes a work of art it must die of anæmia, and for it to become a work of art it must follow the laws which have governed all art. It might enrol in its behalf artistes who alone can create works of art. I know from personal experience that all great artistes are attracted to the kinema."

I know that, too, because I have talked the matter over with several of them, but what inducement is there held out to them to make it possible to enlist their services?

M. Diaghileff goes on to say:—"At the present moment every actor who fails in his profession becomes a kinema performer. Nowhere is it understood that it is essential for the kinema to have a technique at least equivalent to that of a great dancer. To make a beautiful gesture on the screen involves, if anything, rather more artistic responsibility than to dance a pirouette on the stage. But at the present time there is this distinction: the dancer has studied his pirouette for ten years or more, whereas the kinema performer had not even thought of his gesture."

I thank M. Diaghileff for having said this; it is a very great compliment to the kinema, and every film artiste who takes his or her work seriously should be grateful to him for having said it. I should like to see that sentence written in letters of gold in every studio.

Perhaps I may be pardoned for giving the history of a gesture that I used in the rôle of the Christus in the film "From the Manger to the Cross," when playing the scene in the Garden of Gethsemane in Jerusalem. Many years ago I was struck with the following passage in the book entitled "Actors and Acting," by G. H. Lewes. It refers to the acting of Edmund Kean in Act III. in Othello:—"When shall we see again—that Oriental and yet most natural gesture, which even in its naturalness preserved a grand ideal propriety [for example, when his joined uplifted hands, the palms being upwards, were lowered upon his head, as if to keep his poor head from bursting], that exquisitely touching pathos, and that lurid flame of vengeance in his eye?" For years, though I played many Shakespearean parts, I never had one where I thought I could employ this gesture with propriety, but I practised it assiduously and then my great opportunity came. I used it in the agony in the Garden of Gethsemane.

So you see that sometimes a humble "kinema performer" avails himself of the great tradition. I have a feeling that many directors have a contempt for the actors who interpret parts for them. Anyone will do so long as he is the type.

INTERIOR EXTERIORS

P. M. M. Rogers, who, as a former member of the Star Publicity Co., edited many of the Swedish Biograph and other pictures in this country, has just returned from New York, where he has been working with Cosmopolitan Productions.

What got me more than anything else in the American studio, he says, was the wonderful accuracy with which complete exteriors were built on the floor. Whole streets, with stores, pavements, fire-hydrants, and the like, are constructed to get the exact type of location desired by the director. They are by no means jerry-built affairs of paint and canvas, but solid wooden structures which an army of carpenters and glaziers take days and weeks to erect. One of the most interesting features in one studio I visited was an immense sky-dome. It had been discovered that the usual canvas drop, no matter how tightly stretched, was apt to show wrinkle shadows when under the eagle eye of the camera, and the big structure was put up to eliminate this factor.

Many people probably consider this method of working a mere example of "useless American expense," but when one realises that it is possible to shoot exteriors no matter what the weather outside (and it changes quickly enough in New York), that both artistes and director can work unhampered by the "star-gazing" public, that travelling expenses are eliminated, and that a crowd can work all day instead of only a few hours if the weather breaks—that you can take your scene when you want to, not when you can—then the outlay will be found to be well worth the while.

Naturally, these "interior exteriors" require very careful lighting, as the shadows cast by trees, etc., must be natural but batteries of sunlight arcs played from an overhead gallery aid the customary banks and shoots, giving either brilliant summer or winter's gloom as is desired.

TOPICALS— HERE AND THERE

Although most of the American studio cameramen are comparatively well known here in England and their methods are spoken of by us all, the American topical man has hitherto been almost unheard of. It remains for Henry Saunders, editor of the "Pathé Gazette," to throw a little light on the methods of the American topical man, as compared with the style of our own topical kine. photographers.

Mr. Saunders has just returned from a six weeks' stay in America, where he has been filming the Washington Conference for his firm. During that time he has associated himself with the topical men of America, and has studied their methods very carefully.

The American topical is almost as important as the feature film in picture house programs. It is issued twice a week, in the same way as ours, but is invariably one thousand feet in length. It contains a great deal of explanatory sub-titles, and, where the cameraman has been unable to secure a picture of an event, a cartoon is shown, with various illustrations and statistics.

The Americans seem to favour the stunt story rather than one with some real news value. They prefer to see a man climbing bridges, or jumping from aeroplanes rather than to have photos of big events.

They do not seem to worry about the events being out of date. The topical over there goes to press at a certain hour, and no matter how important a story is, it must wait until the following issue if it does not come in at the appointed press time. We are more up to date with our topicals in this country. There is, of course, no set time for going to press here. A topical must wait for an important story, and so we find it no uncommon thing to have events showing which happened on the previous day.

The Americans have done away with exclusive rights; such a thing does not exist there. Thus a great deal of rivalry between cameramen and firms is avoided, and the cameraman seems to take a delight in helping to get a good position for his brother cameraman, even if he belongs to the rival firm.

Monthly police passes are issued to all topical cameramen. The Americans have accepted the movies as part of their national life, and a cameraman causes no excitement whatever when he appears in the street. The Government co-operate with the topical firms and see that they are looked after in every possible way.

Cameramen, by reason of their police passes, gain admittance to otherwise inaccessible spots. England might take a hint from the way the American police treat the cameraman. A great deal of time, trouble and worry could be saved if only the English police would supply topical men with more facilities for filming. The Americans have their permits sent to them monthly without even having to apply for them.

As an instance of the co-operation between the Government and American photographer, Sunlight arcs were allowed to illuminate the Washington Conference, for three minutes, while it was actually in session, and the cameramen were admitted to photograph the scene.

Mr. Saunders was wonderfully well received by the Americans, who went to a great deal of trouble to assist him in every possible way.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Lunched with Fred Le Roy Granville at the Club and was very interested to hear of the excellent proposition with which he has come over. This is nothing less than a signed contract with the W. W. Hodkinson Corporation—one of the leading renting organisations in America—who undertake to handle in America any picture that Mr. Granville makes in England. This strikes me as being a wonderful opportunity for the introduction of good British pictures into America, and as the publication of this paragraph is the first announcement of this proposition there is a "fair field and no favour" for all and any to get in on this excellent opportunity.

* * *

It would be interesting to know exactly how many people in the studios have scrapped "Put and Take" and have turned their sporting proclivities in the direction of "Odds On." This is the latest top game and I have noticed parties playing it at three studios that I visited this week. The top has six sides inscribed with the names of a well-known horse and this part turns independently of the upper portion which bears the odds.

* * *

It is not generally known that Alban Atwood, who was one of the band of "British Actors" at Bushey, is the son of a famous father. During the Tichborne case Dr. Atwood was co-bail with Lord Rivers for the gigantic claimant, and as he himself scaled over 28 stone he was frequently mistaken for the central figure in the case. Alban was leading man in Sir John Hare's company, and also figured prominently in W. S. Penley's production. His heart is still in film work in which he has considerable experience as a player of aristocratic parts.

At last things are on the move and the producing business is slowly starting on its big offensive, which should be at its height during the summer months. Gaumont has just started a special super film; Davidson started work on a new film last Wednesday; George Clarke has engaged most of the cast for "Boy Woodburn," in which Guy Newall and Ivy Duke are starred; John Gliddon is getting busy for his next production, "The Lark's Gate"; Maurice Elvey and his company have started work at Stolls for Welsh Pearson Martin-Thornton is making final preparations for the new film in which Victor McLaglen is starred; Ideal is busy at Elstree where three directors are working; George Ridgwell is still on the Sherlock Holmes series; Hepworth is busy and Granger-Binger has taken on an extra director. So why worry?

* * *

In order to enable readers to obtain full benefit from the STUDIO, we have arranged for the paper to go to press a little earlier. The latest time, in future, for editorial copy is Wednesday morning, and for advertisements, Wednesday noon. The paper will in future be mailed to subscribers on Friday, and be on their breakfast tables on Saturday. And—remember—the surest plan for obtaining the STUDIO is to send a postal order for five shillings to this office, when it will be sent, post free, for three months.

* * *

The production of "The Further Adventures of Sherlock Holmes" proceeds apace, and George Ridgwell is already filming the thirteenth of the fifteen two-reel episodes. The first of the series to be released will be "The Adventure of Charles Augustus Milverton," on March 27. Eille Norwood should enhance his popularity with the public both by reason of his wonderful personation of Holmes and by reason of his ability, as Holmes, to disguise himself as effectively as ever that hero of detective fiction did—although Eille Norwood has to contend with a difficulty which was utterly unknown to the sleuth of Baker Street, viz., the difficulty of superimposing every disguise he adopts over his make-up as Sherlock, which is almost a disguise (for the accomplished actor) in itself.

* * *

Guy Newall has led rather a crowded existence since his recent return from America, and he looks like having to hustle for some little time to come. For "Boy Woodburn," the George Clark film version of Alfred Olivant's novel, is to be released by Stoll on May 1, and up to last Friday not a single "shot" had been fired at the picture. Having got "Beauty and the Beast" finished for Jeffrey Bernard in time to be presented at the Alhambra as a very comic curtain-raiser to "The Sign on the Door," however, he has now set to work on

"Boy Woodburn," and is confident that he will get this film finished in good time. Fortunately, the picture consists almost entirely of exteriors.

* * *

In the advertisement on Max Roma's page last week, the telephone number was given wrongly. Artistes and directors should make a note that the 'phone number of the Fryer and Rodger Agency is Regent 3282.

* * *

While I am always ready to appreciate enterprise, I really feel that John Gliddon could have found among his British comrades an ingenue for his next International production. Doris Eaton may be clever and ideally suited to the part, but I have an idea that we have just as clever and just as suitable actresses already in this country without the necessity of Gliddon going to America to find Miss Eaton, whom he has brought back with him, and who proceeds to Egypt next week to commence work on the production. Because of the existence of the V.A.F., the variety artistes would not stand such an invasion, but so long as kinema artistes are unorganised I suppose they must grin and bear it.

* * *

Writing last week I referred to George Pearson's discontent with his own work, and stated that great men are never satisfied with their work. This week comes confirmation. Because of the objections made in the Kinematograph Weekly and the STUDIO, Mr. Pearson has gone to the very considerable trouble and expense of re-taking the scenes objected to with an artiste in an entirely different make-up. Only a truly great director would make such a frank admission, and George Pearson stands congratulated on his greatness.

* * *

It is good to hear that at least one British film company is kept so continuously active that even Sunday has to be embraced into its working days. The Masters Studio, at Teddington, is busy on its second series of Song Pictures, the first proving such a popular success that the public, like Oliver Twist, is asking for more.

AND PROVINCIAL THEATRES,

POINTS OF VALUE

At a meeting of the Stoll Picture Theatre Club held on February 1, Wyndham Standing and Hugh Croise debated the topic of "What Constitutes a Good Picture?"

Wyndham Standing said the first essential was a good story and moreover a good love story.

Casting a picture is all important. The personalities of the actors must be attractive, for atmosphere is brought in with the first fade-in of the players. Experience has shown that the first fade-in of a character is decisive: its effect is irretrievable. All acting is character acting: there is no such thing as a "straight" part.

The director should take a scenario and regard it as a framework to which he must add his own artistic touches and original ideas.

Hugh Croise, whilst agreeing that good film production calls for a Catholic breadth of vision and a handling in the grand manner. He went on to say that the chief essentials of a good film were mainly simplicity and sincerity of acting: a sense of vision and of right proportion rather than money lavishly spent, luxurious setting-expensive dresses. He agreed, however, that British production was sadly hampered for lack of capital: but in spite of almost insuperable odds Britain is making some of the best films in the world. Although America has the markets to-day and is turning out the most attractive international all-round marketable films, yet it is by no means assured that easy capital and all that goes with it in the shape of first-class studios, technical detail, and apparatus necessarily means good pictures. For the most part it simply means showy pictures.

Turning to America, Hugh Croise said that the one standard of value in the U.S. was dollars. To be successful in America a picture must look costly. The settings and dressing must be elaborate. The type of picture that makes an irresistible appeal to American audiences is the mushy ultra-sentimental story, sprinkled with erring children and weeping mothers.

With regard to women, he agreed that the sophisticated screen "flapper" was peculiarly the product of America, without her counterpart in the world. On the screen this sophisticated type is a success, but while as a producer he might find it advantageous to have at hand girls of 18, capable of portraying the emotions of a woman of 40, as an Englishman he believed that our own more natural women, with their real knowledge, experience and stage technique, have not their superiors in the world.

"We are often told," he continued, "that we should make films for America, but it must be borne in mind that America is a big place and consists of masses not classes. The Americans are not interested in ancient castles, and the bulk of picture patrons glean their knowledge of the English language via an East side New York tenement quarters. Their vocabulary is as limited as their emotions. We can get into the American market just as soon as British capital is forthcoming to allow us to put on our pictures the mark of the dollar, which is the key to success in the United States."

When the meeting was thrown open for questions and discussion several speakers questioned Hugh Croise's views with regard to the American market, taking the view that with so much material at hand that is not only artistic but typically British, our producers should not attempt to imitate the showy productions that Americans can do to perfection. They should rather aim at giving America something different.

NO FASCINATION IN FILMS

Teddie Gerard, who is (literally) dazzling all beholders in Andre Charlot's new version of "A to Z" at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, has nothing in common with those who divide their time between stage and screen, as she explains in the following special article:—

There is no similarity in the work, and, personally, I do not find a scrap of fascination in acting for the film. It is tedious, full of anti-climax and inverted situations. Such things are amusing enough in burlesque, as Mr. Buchanan does it in the "Green-Eyed Monster" sketch; but I hate the idea of being married and divorced (interior scenes first!), and then going off on my honeymoon with the man who threw me over!

It is hard to feel such situations when so much out of their sequence. Give me the natural spontaneity of the stage every time, where the cause precedes the effect.

The conditions under which a film artiste works, too, are not comparable with the straight-forward schedule of stage rehearsal. The director may summon you from your bed at six in the morning to catch the sunlight and keep you out of it until midnight for his gloaming effects. You are spirited away into the wilderness and possibly stranded there, inadequately clad and ill-provided with those good things which make for a contented mind, and probably do nothing the whole day. It rains, the sun sets and tempers rise. Then everybody looks just right for the death scene, but it is possibly the harassed directors' intention to get on with the "Bohemian revels by night."

For those who do not know the pleasures of the stage, the warming influence of the lights, and the stimulus of applause, and those who for some other reason do not agree with me, picture-making may be a great life. but I prefer the stage—the best is always good enough for me!

THE ARTISTE'S WORST ENEMY

More Views from Representative Artistes

by IRENEE CRAVEN

As the kinema profession is already overcrowded, I consider it is the vast herd of usurpers that is the genuine artiste's worst enemy. The titled personage seeking new amusement; unemployed typists or kitchen maids; bank clerks or chauffeurs, clamouring for crowds or small parts until something in their line turns up; the dreamy, screen-struck; or—one of the worst kinds, in my opinion—the stage star who, not being content to draw one salary or take their turn at being "out for a few weeks," push themselves into films on the strength of their names.

by MILES MANDER

"The Artiste's Worst Enemy!" What pitfalls for the unwary. Really, Mr. Editor, you have not scanned the difficulties that bristle round the theme of such a treatise. You ask me my views, 'tis true, in sterling faith, and I acknowledge the intended compliment with gratitude born of modesty. In fact, the thought of possible publicity excites the very soul of my ambition, but, on the other hand, discretion screams so loudly that the voice of Truth, its rival, is perforce engulfed in the Babel of that conscience that makes cowards of us all. 'Tis possible, you see, nay probable, that this "worst enemy" of which you speak lurks in some shadowed corner of the studio; the lamps, perhaps, or script, the sets, the cameraman, or (God forgive me) the director!

Who knows this "enemy" is not sometimes our closest friend? Who knows that some of us do not depend on this "grim phantom" for our daily bread? Though starting with a trickling stream of kindly dissertation, our fervent arguments might soon become a torrent of destructive criticism.

Thus is our quandary quite easily discernible. No, no—Sirrah! I thank you, but another subject please, another subject.

by SYDNEY M. FOLKER

Who is the worst enemy of the artistes? That question must give some folk the opportunity for which they have sought for years to have a slap back at someone who has not acted to them in a manner that befits the compleat gentleman.

For myself, I have never given a real thought as to who may or who may not be a particular enemy of mine. I had always cherished a fond hope that I was blessed (or cursed) with no such attachment. Had I thought that such a person existed I should have made every endeavour to get on the Selection Committee of the Kinema Club prior to mine enemy's application for membership. I should have then awaited the arrival of his form as a vulture waits for its prey, and when it arrived!

Ha! Ha! I should have delivered the speech of my life. I should have rent his character in twain. My fellow committeemen would have been aghast at my sudden affluence, for I should have poured forth such a flow of adjectives that would have done credit to Old Bill.

SHOULD STARS SPECIALISE

by FRED WRIGHT

The object of every stage producer, film director and artiste is undoubtedly to give the public what it wants. But the problem with which the artiste is continually faced is "What does the public want?" or harder still—"What will the public want next time?" Should the artiste, to be a success, concentrate on one type, and specialise in one type of part, or should he cultivate versatility? It is a question that no one has yet been able to answer satisfactorily. The editor's opinion might help some of us to decide.

For instance, during my many theatrical experiences, I have known the audience to be exceedingly enthusiastic over a style of my own which I introduced in a certain production. The management saw that the public liked me and booked me for the next production. I thought out my part on different lines, but they said: "Fred, that's risky!" so I went back to my first style, they then said: "Fred, that's risky."

And they were right both times.

Then they suggested—"more of the same thing only different."

And they were right again.

If one gives the same, will our dear public sit up and applaud, and say: "Oh! isn't he just nicer than ever?" or lean back and yawn and say: "Good heavens! we've seen him do this before?"

And I get brain fever trying to decide.

For instance, I once played a part where I carried a whip and did a lot of "business" with it. A lady saw me in that, and also in a succeeding part. Meeting me after the latter she said:—"Oh! Mr. Wright, I wish you had cracked a whip!"

Personally, I lean towards the versatility answer to this ever-present question of "what does the public want?" both as regards film and stage work.

If an artiste be an artiste in the true sense of the word, it is not type that counts, but personality, individuality, and talent. Given these, then he should be able to make a success of any part suited to him. Of course I do not mean that Little Tich should make a success in "Hamlet"—that is wide of the mark.

However, I think one finds that save for a very few exceptional cases, the really successful stars of the present day are those who have proved their versatility, and by reason of an attractive personality have "got over," and that they have such a strong following amongst their audiences, that their name is sufficient to attract long queues to the box office.

Take as an example Pauline Frederick. Does it matter to the average picture-goer whether their favourite is appearing in a low character part or as a society woman? I think not. To them she is Pauline Frederick, an artiste who will hold their interest by reason of her talent, no matter in what part she is appearing.

Too often one hears the remark "Yes, he maybe very clever, but if you have seen him in one play, you have seen him in all." This, because he specialises.

There is a great deal of truth in the old saying that "variety is the spice of life," and to-day I should be a very discontented man if I had specialised. From the artiste's point of view, I consider that specialisation hampers progress. All successful people in this world take big risks at sometime in their lives.

Personally, I should contemplate suicide or something equally uninteresting if I thought that, because I play the crazy hunchback in "The Glorious Adventure," that I should be destined for similar parts for the rest of my days. Think how awful it would be to be cast for nothing but crazy or hunchback parts, or to be told one would never wear decent clothes when working before the camera.

I have very keen recollections of those humpty rags, and I unearthed them in the basement of Willie Clarkson's establishment where they had been secreted for æons—probably since the Great Fire, and they smelt and felt worse than horrible! After fitting, Willie had to send me down his pet canary and I bathed in the song bird's water. But think how unsavoury and uncivilised I should feel if I were cast for nothing but raggedy roles.

Seriously, it is a great far-reaching question—who can decide it?

YOUR CORNER

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THOSE KINEMA SCHOOLS.

I wish your correspondent "V. M. M." had given his or her name. I was perfectly frank in giving mine, and never sought to conceal the fact that I once attended a kinema school, for six so-called "lessons" only.

I quickly saw through the farce of the teaching, and left. In my initial efforts to find work I was hampered on every side by the mere mention of this school, and any success which I have attained is entirely due to my own efforts.—FREDA KAYE.

A PICTUREGOER'S VIEW

I have been reading the article by Tom Terriss—"Linking the Studios with the Public"—in last week's MOTION PICTURE STUDIO, and I have often thought that it would make a picture-play more interesting were a few moments in the introduction devoted to showing a picture of the author and director, instead of just their names.

I think I am stating the opinion of many other picture-goers who want to see the power behind the picture. We want to see the person who wrote the story, the person who visualised the scenes, so that we can form our opinion of him, and say to our neighbour in the theatre—"He looks a clever sort of chap." Or perhaps, recognising the face of a director whose work we have admired before—"Oh, that's Mr. George So-and-So, now we are going to see something good."

Nine people out of every ten have a far readier memory for faces than for names, it's the face that interests them, not the name.

So I, for one, will welcome the time when we shall see not only the director's name but his picture upon the screen, thus giving him the credit which he deserves. A face conveys much, a name very little.—HERBERT C. AARON.

"ALICE IN FILMLAND"

by HUGH E. WRIGHT.

CHAPTER VII.—OPPORTUNITY.

"Curiouser and curiouser!" said Alice, for she got an extraordinary feeling of lightness and importance. Then the elastic of her hat broke with a little snap, and her hat tumbled on to the floor. "My head seems to be swelling, swelling," thought Alice, "and somehow it's rather pleasant."

She looked at the bottle again, and discovered that under the words "DRINK ME!" "Advance Notices" was written in small type.

Just then the Comedian came into the room. "Hallo!" he said amiably. "You've got swelled head!"

"Nothing of the sort," said Alice indignantly.

The little man smiled, and, taking the bottle from her hand, read the label. "Funny! they all do it!" he said enigmatically, and added, "Did it myself once!"

"I don't know how you dare come into my room at all," said Alice. It was curious that she suddenly realised what a vulgar, common little man the Comedian was.

The little man took no notice. "You've got another bottle to drink yet," he murmured.

"Where?" said Alice. "What do you mean?"

"At the end of the table," he answered.

Alice looked; the table seemed to stretch out into infinity. "How long it is," she said.

"Only about a month, but it always seems longer at first," said the Comedian.

She walked, and walked—years, it seemed. But eventually, sure enough, she came to the end at last, and just on the edge of the table stood a little bottle. Alice picked it up, and found it was labelled "TRADE SHOW."

"Shall I?" she said to herself.

After a moment's hesitation she drained it.

For a minute or so Alice wondered what was happening. Everything seemed to go round and round at a tremendous pace, leaving her standing in the middle holding on to nothing with both hands. Gradually everything slowed up, and she found that she was standing in a crowded hall, clutching the Comedian's arm.

"I told you you'd have to drink it," he said, smiling down at her. "Feeling nervous?"

"I'm not quite sure," said Alice. "Where am I?"

"This is the Trade Show!" answered the Comedian.

"But what is a Trade Show, exactly?" asked Alice.

"A Trade Show is an Opportunity," he replied.

"What for?" asked Alice again.

"Oh, hundreds of things!" said the little Comedian, vaguely. "Hundreds and hundreds. For instance, it's an opportunity for a lot of people of no importance to see a film for nothing; then it's an opportunity for a few people of even less importance to decide privately what the Public want; it's an opportunity for engaged couples to hold hands in the morning; it's an opportunity for the Star's friends to say nasty things about her over lunch; it's an excellent opportunity if you feel sleepy; it's —"

"I think that will be enough," interrupted Alice, hastily.

CLUB NEWS A.

The Editor has received the following letter from Max Freeman, and this is printed together with the reply of the Secretary of the Executive Committee:—

The meeting of "All the Committees" of the Kinema Club held last Friday was instructive in more ways than one. It made abundantly evident

(1) The need for a careful revision of the rules.

(2) That the rules must be framed on broad principles—not on minor considerations.

(3) That whether good, bad, or indifferent, rules, so long as they are rules, should be observed.

(4) That failure in this respect has proved the rock on which many clubs and associations have come to grief.

(5) That the present constitution of the Club is contradictory as the rules do not fit the facts.

(6) That each Sub-Committee should be represented on the Executive Committee in order to secure proper liaison.

(7) That pending the necessary alteration of the rules, this could be arranged by co-option.

(8) That constructive criticism is helpful.

Not yet having had an opportunity to study the rules I write with reserve; but if, as I understand, the rules provide that the Executive Committee shall elect its own officers, then there was no need for the meeting of "All the Committees" for this purpose.

At this meeting it was stated that the Executive "had accepted the resignation of certain officers, but that the confirmation of the larger meeting was required." This is a perfectly understandable position. But in spite of the fact that the full meeting on Friday was specifically convened "for the purpose of electing officers to fill offices on the Executive Committee rendered vacant by resignation," this meeting was informed that it could only nominate and that the Executive would elect.

Now, without expressing any opinion as to which is the correct procedure in this Gilbertian situation, it is obvious that both cannot be. Those who were present at the first general meeting of members of the Club will remember that a certain number of persons (about 45) were elected as the governing body of the Club. (It was suggested at the time that this body should be named the Council, but the suggestion was not adopted.) This number of persons then elected, by ballot, and from among its own number, an Executive Committee. The Executive Committee is therefore a part of the larger body, and as, according to Euclid, "the whole is greater than its part," the Executive must be subordinate to the full meeting. (I use the term in the absence of a proper designation.) These are the historic facts, which do not agree with the rules—hence the incongruity.

With a view to correcting this difficult state of things I submit the following for the consideration of members.

(A) That the "Full Meeting" of elected members, i.e., the 45, become the Executive.

(B) That the Executive only meet quarterly or when specially convened.

(C) That from the Executive all the Sub-Committees be formed.

(D) That each Sub-Committee shall have its own Chairman and Honorary Secretary, and certain defined powers.

(E) That the unwieldy size of the Executive makes another Sub-Committee desirable.

(F) That a new Sub-Committee known as the "General Purposes and Finance" Committee, be for

(G) That this Committee consist of a Chairman and Hon. Secretary and a Sub-Committee—the officers of the Executive to be ex-officio members.

(H) That all payments by or on behalf of the Club shall have the authority of the General Purposes and Finance Committee.

(J) That each Sub-Committee shall submit a brief report to the Executive, including a financial statement by the General Purposes and Finance Committee at each quarterly meeting.

(K) That special meetings of the Executive may be convened on the authority of the General Purposes Committee, or at the request of not less than 10 members of the Executive.

(L) The General Purposes and Finance Committee to meet not less than once a month.

If some such procedure as this be adopted the work of the various Committees will be co-ordinated, and thereby assisted, to the benefit of the Club and the members generally.

It is with the single wish to support and develop the Club that I have ventured to put forward these suggestions, which are the result of considerable experience in the framing of rules, in committee work, and in general organisation; and I am confident that they will be received in the spirit in which they are tendered.

Stuart Blackton's excellent slogan, "Think Big," may quite properly be applied where the administration of the Club is concerned.

The Secretary replies:—

In the first place there is no dispute as to the necessity for "a careful revision" of one or two of the rules—this is due to the fact that they were compiled at a rush, and also to the fact that the compilers were neither cherubims nor seraphims, but merely mortals.

(2) The rules are already framed on broad principles; in fact, are based on the constitution of the Green Room, Garrick and Savage Clubs.

(3) and (4) The Executive and other Committees exist for the purpose of seeing that the rules are observed.

(5) Mr. Freeman, like every other member, is fully aware that a new club, like anything else that is new, cannot avoid the imperfections of youth. And it is fairly obvious that the function of a committee is not to make the rules fit the facts, but to make the facts fit the rules.

(6) At present each Sub-Committee is represented on the Executive Committee and there is already "proper liaison"; therefore (7) does not arise.

We welcome constructive criticism, but how can Mr. Freeman criticise the rules before he has seen them?

So far as last Friday's meeting is concerned, the rules did not make it necessary for that meeting to be held; but the Executive Committee considered that, as an act of courtesy to the members of the various Committees, they should be called to accept the resignations of certain of the officers whom they had previously elected.

Mr. Freeman is quite right with respect to his description of the first general meeting, but Euclid proves nothing beyond the already-admitted fact that it "is absurd." The whole was greater than the part, without a doubt, but while admitting that

"Beauty of Technique."

AFTER Gordon Craig's notorious outburst against the cinematograph as a medium of entertainment, it is encouraging to discover that, after all, sanity is the predominating factor in the minds of most people in the theatrical profession. Writing in the Curtain, Marion Cran says: "When the kinema arrived among us the brains and hearts of the world were swift to feel its power, and now they are sifting out the beauty of its technique and building up a new standard from what they have learned and admired in it." This is as correct as it is new in expression. There is, undoubtedly, a mental condition of criticism abroad. The public which, because of its novelty, would stand almost anything on the screen, no matter how putrid tripe it might be, is now sitting bolt upright and taking very keen notice. Its critical faculty has been sharpened razor-keen. And when it succeeds in "sifting out the beauty of its technique," its support of the kinema is cemented. Unfortunately, the average film is not capable of standing this test, consequently the support is undermined.

Two Forms of Expression.

ANOTHER point that Marion Cran makes is that the film is making the discriminating public exquisitely sensitive to the significance and grace of movement, and is learning to enjoy the human body without the acerbities of the human voice and to resent it when it meets it raw. This is one of the natural results of the extreme veracity of the camera. Its pitiless eye reveals that which is ugly in bodily movement or facial expression and shows up in sharp and pleasing relief physical aesthetics. Stripped of the heavy disguise of the human voice, the actor is thrown back on to his own personality in order to portray the character with which he has been vested. The film artiste is thus forced to face a more keen test than his confrere on the stage, for the latter has at his command two forms of expression—voice and movement—while the film artiste has to concentrate on the movement only. With gesture and facial expression, he speaks with all his mentality to the listening brains of the public.

Criteria of Judgment.

THIS being so, Marion Cran is of the opinion that the result of this intensive education in delicacy of discernment will inevitably react grievously before very long on those purveyors of theatrical wares who do not offer goods up to these new standards accepted by the public as a result of kine-going. It is no coincidence that with the growth of the screen has grown also a more critical and more exacting public which makes all theatrical and screen performances face the criterion of its newly-formed judgment. It is safe to say that constant viewing of films has caused the public to readjust its views of things theatrical, and this has had its effect on stage presentations.

Public Intelligence.

NOR must our film producing concerns and film directors lose sight of the significance of this. It means that if the public has now grown drama-wise enough

¶ IT'S EASY TO SMILE
When everything is going right.

¶ IT'S EASY TO CRY
When everything is going wrong.

¶ BUT IT'S HARD TO SMILE
When things are bad,
And it's February everywhere
And there's nothing doing.

¶ YET — THAT'S THE RIGHT TIME
To smile,
Because if you smile
The world will smile with you,
And the world needs smiles Badly.

to judge keenly and condemn readily defective stage presentations, it does, by the same token, act in the same way towards the cause of its drama-wisdom—the screen. All that has to be done is to look around and note the producing concerns of successful screen plays. And this fact is instantly noted: those few who have succeeded owe their success to an appreciation of the intelligence of the public. The public is no longer the fool—so far as the screen is concerned—that it once was. Time was when the novelty of the photoplay disguised its blatant imperfections. But now, the novelty has gone; there is no disguise left. And photoplays are being judged by this keen and critical public on their own merits. That is why so many fail and so few succeed.

What Is Good Business?

THOSE with any mental perception at all are conscious of a new and positive movement in the film world. Not only are films being taken seriously by the intelligentsia, but into the ranks of those engaged in the profession is creeping the intellectuals. These men have been convinced that the function of the film is not to be a silent edition of the old penny gaff, but for it to amuse with elevating entertainment an intelligent public. It requires, then, no mantle of Elijah or Old Moore to predict that, in view of these two facts—an intelligent public and an intelligent section of the profession—those who cannot bring themselves and their productions up to this higher and intellectual plane will die natural deaths. There is a change coming over the face of the profession—it is the movement of the intelligent to the seats of power and a movement of the crude, blatant unintelligent class to the back door. And this is the best thing that could happen to the profession and to the industry. The film profession is not a game nor a hobby; it is an artistic business. And the elementary principle of good business is: "Anticipate the requirements of your customers." In the case of photoplays "your customers" is the public, and its requirements are for all that is best and the most intelligent in screen drama.

Removing the Wool.

DURING the past week the trial of the people behind the notorious London Cinema Academy at Shaftesbury Avenue has been concluded, and the two prisoners sentenced to nine and fifteen months' imprisonment. It is to be hoped that this will have the dual effect of stamping out the pernicious system of kinema schools and of removing the wool from the eyes of the screen-struck who have hitherto been so idiotic as to part with large sums for small services. It is also to be hoped that this will also help to warn off those intensely shortsighted directors who have been accustomed to engage their crowds from the inexperienced pupils of these schools because they can be obtained much cheaper than the experienced and professional screen artiste. We have knowledge of one fairly well-known director who stoops to this. In the meantime we are instituting investigations into a few others of the existing "schools" and shall be in the position to make some interesting and startling disclosures in subsequent issues.

MOBILISING THE DIRECTORS

There are various co-ordinating movements in operation in the profession which, besides indicating a general advance, are also of positive assistance to the profession and all concerned. Of course, the biggest and most important is the opening of the Kinema Club. This week we have to announce a movement in favour of the formation of an Association for Directors.

Last Friday, at the Cadogan Hotel, eighteen leading British directors attended a private meeting specially convened by W. G. Faulkner. Of those invited to be present only four were unable to attend, and each of these was unavoidably prevented. There were present the following directors:—

Thomas Bentley, A. V. Bramble, Capt. Calvert, E. J. Collins, A. E. Coleby, Maurice Elvey, Bert Haldane, Will Kellino, Geoffrey Malins, Sidney Morgan, Percy Nash, Harold Shaw, Martin Thornton, Fred Paul, George Ridgwell, Arthur Rooke and Bert Wynne. Sinclair Hill, Wilfred Noy, Kenelm Foss and Hugh Croise were unable to attend owing to conflicting engagements.

The object of the gathering, we understand, was to co-operate for the purpose of enhancing the status of the directorial section of the profession, and a small sub-committee was appointed to formulate a scheme and propose a draft constitution. This sub-committee, formed of Percy Nash, Martin Thornton and W. G. Faulkner, is now sitting, and we hope to be able to announce developments later. We are assured that the plan is not to form any sort of association antagonistic to other phases of the profession, but there is reason to believe that the Association will run on lines similar to the Motion Picture Directors' Association of America.

"The Motion Picture Directors' Association," says Wids Year Book, "was founded in February, 1915, Hollywood, California. There was need of co-ordination among directors at the time in order to devote their energies to the improvement of film production. Many of these were unknown, personally, one to the other. Good fellowship, and the results which now reflect to the honour and glory of combined ideas and exchange of suggestions among fellow-directors, had not been thought of. Common grievance, however, brought them close together—slander against conditions supposedly existing in studios, jealousy among directors, scheming, malice. Conditions affecting directors were deplorable. One producing company claimed the right to photograph exclusively (eliminating other companies entirely) the heaven-given stretch of ocean front and rock ledges in Southern California. Directors were held responsible for things which never happened or with which they had nothing to do.

"Organisation suggested, the first meeting was attended by nine directors, although many more would have joined the gathering were it not for the down-pour of rain.

"Primarily, the establishing of the New York Lodge (organised in 1917) was the result of increased efforts of the eastern men to compete in the matter of production against coast (Los Angeles) activities.

"The Lodge of Motion Picture Directors is neither a union nor a social club. It is a fraternal order. Its rituals render impossible the idea of coercion, and eliminate any element of partiality or unfairness. The essential purpose of the organisation, to quote one of the founders, is to fill that great need of providing a clearing house of ideas which every art has required and through which every art has succeeded in developing to its highest forms.

"Followers of the motion pictures are fast determining their favourite directors, as well as their favourite stars. A supposedly great star cannot appear to advantage in a poorly-directed picture, while previously undiscovered talent has risen to heights unbelievable via the skill of a competent director."

LETTERS FROM LIONEL

No. I.

Dear Mr. Editor,—Please, I am very much worried, I am hoping you will help me. I want to produce. I am sure I could if I was only sure what to do, but I hear so many things—I see so many things—I am told so many things, that I get quite confused.

You see, I have got a story. It's a wonderful story—at least I think so—and I am sure the renters will love it—but I snan't tell them about it in case they turn it down.

But everything is so confusing. I want to be the director, and then I find there are so many other directors and managers—art directors, location directors, casting directors, studio managers, floor managers, props. manager and camera managers and electricians. I feel we might clash—should we? Besides, what sort of director am I? There is nothing left.

Then there is your paper. Really, Mr. Editor—you shouldn't, you know. It makes everything so much more difficult. First I look at the pictures and then I read the print. And I am told to do this and told to do that and I can't make anything agree. Who, excepting yourself, really knows?

Meanwhile, I have £300 to produce this picture, and I know I shall lose it.

Casting is so difficult. Someone told me to go to an agent. But these agents are funny people. One keeps chickens apparently which lays eggs—not to be thrown at the artiste whose name is on them, I hope. And then another seems to have a collection of jewels—very expensive, I am sure.

Someone mentioned a firm called Brams. of Jaylins or some name like that, but I found so many ladies there I went away. Father said I must be careful if I went on the films, and I am; but it is all very exciting, isn't it?

I believe I must have a studio. Would you recommend one? Someone mentioned the B.C. studio—that sounds a bit ancient, doesn't it? Then there is the Welsh Pearson studio, but the first name has such a horse-racing sound and I know nothing about horses. I think the one I should like best is called the Princes studio. The Prince is such a lucky young man that I don't see how my film could go West in that.

Yours humbly, LIONEL AGINGTON.

Harley Knoles and his bride at the Alliance Studios on the occasion of the staff presentation in connection with his wedding reported fully in a recent issue.

Intimate Studio Gossip

At its last meeting the Executive Committee of the Club sent a letter of congratulation to Bernerd Bromhead, whose absence from the meeting was due to the fact that at the time the meeting was being held he was spending joyous moments in writing a new name in the fly leaf of the family Bible. I hasten to add my congratulations to Mr. and Mrs. Bromhead over the happy event, and am delighted to know that both mother and child are doing well.

How on earth can justice be done by the Press to British films when Trade shows are so badly organised that "dead-heads" of the deepest dye are provided with tickets while legitimate viewers are kept outside locked doors. This was the experience of one of the members of the STUDIO review staff and another Press critic, in addition to Campbell Gullan and other artistes, at Ideal's Trade show of "Bentley's Conscience." The Shaftesbury Pavilion doors were locked, and our reviewer had to return without being able to see the picture. This is bad business for Ideal and for those who were engaged on the production of the picture.

* * *

Said "Good-bye" to John Gliddon on Friday, when he commenced his journey, with his International company, to Egypt for exteriors in "Lark's Gate." Doris Eaton and Warwick Ward are among the party, which will also make a stay in Nice for filming purposes. They expect to be away two months at least.

* * *

More proof of the justification of our optimism. Donald Crisp has been engaged to direct several films for the Bird Film Co., and there is some talk of Bird using the F. P.-Lasky Studios; a new company has been formed under the name of Quality Films, and has taken over Screenplays Studio at Clapham to make a series of one-reel subjects—Sydney N. Folker has already fixed up to work for this company, but further announcements have yet to be made; and Butcher has announced the subjects it has arranged to handle for the coming year: production will shortly commence on "When Greek Meets Greek" (Walter West) and will feature Violet Hopson and Stewart Rome; Joan Morgan, supported by a strong cast, will appear in "A Little World Apart"; Violet Hopson and Stewart Rome will also feature in "Kissing Cup II."; "The White Hope" will be another West production, featuring Violet Hopson. Other subjects are selected and will be announced when the principal leads have been chosen. So now, who is down in the mouth?

* * *

The British International Film Corporation, Ltd., the new producing concern which has taken over the Windsor Studios at Catford, has an authorised capital of £150,000. The company has secured the services of Adrian Johnson, the scenario writer. Richard Stanton, an American director who made "Checkers" and "Bride 13" for the Fox Company, Wyndham Standing and Silvano Balboni are also mentioned as being concerned with the company. Work will be started on the first production in four weeks' time. The studios at Catford are to undergo extensive alterations. The company will also take over Lionel Phillips Co., which carries on a film export business. Arrangements have been made to exploit the company's productions in America.

* * *

My sympathies are with Malcolm Tod these trying days. He is playing lead for Davidson in "A Bachelor's Baby," and half of his time is occupied by careering around the country lanes of Torquay balancing a two-months-old infant on the handlebars of his motor grid and the other half in trying to sooth the little beggar who, tween shots, sets up a most dismal howling. Added to these little troubles Tod has to manipulate two or three vociferous parrots. I met him at the Club two days ago. He looked quite ill!

* * *

By the way, have you noticed how popular the Torquay district is with our British producing concerns? I am informed that the actinic properties of the atmosphere are ideal for cinematograph purposes. Will Torquay become the British "Los"?

* * *

There's going to be a busy time at Shepherd's Bush, where the Gaumont Studio staff is busy on the preliminaries to two very elaborate productions. Captain Calvert first takes the floor; his production being the "Life of Lord Byron," for which he is now casting. I am told that he is experiencing some considerable difficulty in casting Lord Byron himself. Will Kellino follows Calvert with "Rob Roy." He intends to direct this film up in Scotland on the actual spots associated with Rob Roy's adventures. The preliminaries of the production are now occupying a great deal of Mr. Kellino's time, but it is hoped that these will shortly be completed, and actual production started in a month or two's time.

I lunched with Kenelm Foss a few days ago, and he informed me that after he has finished "A Romance of Old Baghdad" he has scheduled to make three pictures this year. They are to be "The Beloved Vagabond," "The Everlasting Mercy" and "M'Glusky the Reformer." For the first-named he booked, through Sid Jay, Maurice Moscovitch, the eminent Yiddish actor, and, such are the odds against British directors, within eight hours of the booking a French company made the actor an offer three times as large as that of Foss. Milton Rosmer will star in "The Everlasting Mercy," and Victor McLaglen in the Scottish story of M'Glusky.

Foss made no bones about his views on the Industry. He said—and rightly so—that no British financier can afford to back British pictures while America is allowed to dump pictures on the exhibitors at a very low rental because of the fact that these pictures have already made a huge profit in the States. Further, he declared, no British picture, however good, can get into America, because the American producing concerns also own the theatres. But I was very interested to learn from him that W. H. Thompson had put up £120,000 to allow Foss to make the twelve pictures he has made. I congratulate Mr. Thompson on his real British enterprise and Foss on his association with such a man, and wish success to the new brand—"Kenelm Foss Picture plays."

GETTING INTO U.S.A.

Special "STUDIO" Interview with Cecil M. Hepworth

We have already commented on the plan of Cecil M. Hepworth going to America to study that market and to learn whatever is possible of learning for the benefit of the British producing industry. It is interesting to know from Mr. Hepworth that his visit has been very productive and exceedingly profitable—not in a tangible or concrete sense, but in the sense of those intangible things for the acquiring of which the trip was planned and taken.

Mr. Hepworth took pains to make that statement explicit: he has arranged no associations in America for the distribution of Hepworth productions, nor for his organization in this country to represent any American concern. But he has visited twenty of almost against their intention, of presenting the goods in an attractive manner.

He declares that the American trade has been built up on showmanship and advertising; in fact, he is of opinion that the Americans have erred on the other side: they have over-sold their goods before showing, and have used up all the adjectives coined and coinable in so doing. In this country, he says, the day of merely announcing the name of a film has gone; the strong selling points of a film have to be exploited for all they are worth, and the imagination of a potential public captured.

He denounces the two-feature program, which, while being in a certain sense good for the producing concerns, of which his is one, makes for the ultimate harm of the

"I HEARD YOU CALLING ME."

(With apologies to a well-known song.)

by CYRIL PERCIVAL

I HEARD you calling me!

You called me when the sun had veiled his light
Behind a fog that changed the day to night,
It came—I do remember—I was broke,
And I blessed you for all the years to be.

AND still you're calling me.

The weather seems to know that I am broke,
And daily fills the Studio with smoke.
I wait—so full of patience—all day long
To do one scene—just one short scene—for you.

NOW you've stopped calling me.

Though weeks have passed since you did my little scene;
And oh! when you realised for ten days I had been,
You swore—I do remember—listening there—
Hearing your voice through all the walls between
I heard you CURSING me!

the largest and most representative cities in the States, and paid his admission money through the box-office windows in order to sit among the kine-goers in the theatres of these cities, and so gain first-hand knowledge of their preferences and prejudices—and the reason for them.

Armed with this knowledge he has returned to his own organisation, not with any intention of making Americanised productions, nor forsaking the distinctively British ideals of Hepworth films, but with the facilities for avoiding any of those incidents in films which might offend the American public and so close that market to British films.

Mr. Hepworth is a firm believer in the value of the exhibitor as being the key to the whole industry. And he is convinced that an exhibitor must be more than a manager or overseer of a kinema: first, foremost and fundamentally, the exhibitor must be a showman. He thinks business will be saved by the domination of the exhibitorial side by showmen—men with the capacity for estimating the public's wishes, for selling their goods to the public, for making the public come into the theatres whole Industry. He says that the public's confidence in the cinematographic form of entertainment cannot be retained if two good films are whirled through the projector at breathless speed in order to work off a two-feature program. The result of this procedure is that the quality of productions, when screened, is reduced; acting becomes stilted, direction looks absurd, and the technical properties underestimated because of the speed. If a theatre wants to screen two five-reelers, Mr. Hepworth thinks this ought to be done on a time-table system, commencing in the afternoon, and so allowing ample time for all items in the program to be projected decently.

So far as the question of the importation of British productions into America is concerned, Mr. Hepworth says that the acid-test to the mind of the American is the possession by the film of novel points that can be made the peg on which to hang elaborate advertising. This does not mean that British directors should force unnatural incidents into a production, but that they can only hope to get into the American market those films that are capable of heavy advertising and exploitation.

ON OUR FRONT COVER

As "Potter's Clay" is likely to be seen in London during the next few weeks, Mrs. Bertram Brooke, as leading director of the Big Four Famous Productions, is anxious to correct the impression that the appearance of Ellen Terry is but an incident in the picture.

Miss Terry's part is a large one and of essential value to the story, and shows that our greatest theatrical actress is capable of adapting herself to the exigencies of the screen as gracefully and charmingly as upon the stage, and proves herself fully cognisant of its requirements. Her activities in the film carry her through the whole of the picture and provides a welcome variant to her many delightful characterisations. Miss Terry's part as the mother of the hero is a fine one and enables her to give a portrayal of intense sympathy and understanding. To those stage playgoers whose memory carries them back to her fine performances in "The Good Hope," it is to be recorded that a similar part is found for her in this picture.

Mrs. Bertram Brooke is the Dayang Muda of Sarawak (a title corresponding as nearly as possible with that of Crown Princess), and is sister-in-law of the present Rajah of that Protectorate. She is the daughter of the late Sir Walter Palmer, of Reading, and has identified herself for a number of years in fostering the arts.

In an interview recently she expressed herself as determined to put pictures upon the market whose individuality and charm shall convince international buyers that English films can be produced capable of appealing to all countries and classes.

"For some years past I have been greatly interested in the kinematograph, and I have regretted that English pictures were, on the whole, so crude and so inartistic, particularly from the story point of view. At last, after seeing an appalling British production of a famous stage play, I resolved that I would attempt to do something, even if it were only in a small way, that would more worthily represent the kinema art of this country than some of the films I have seen. Fortunately for my efforts, Ellen Terry was a very old friend of my mother, the late Lady Palmer, whose musical parties in Grosvenor Square were so celebrated.

"We have great hopes in respect of our first production, 'Potter's Clay,' for it is no exaggeration to say that Miss Ellen Terry, who has a very fine part, is magnificent in it. In one scene in which I saw her act real tears came into her eyes, and her voice was broken with emotion. By the by, I have always thought what a wonderful scenic film could be made of Sarawak. The country is very beautiful, and the natives are an artistic and picturesque race, whose life and customs should be most interesting on the screen."

Associated with Miss Terry in this production is Dick Webb, whose work has been consistently excellent for some years, and Peggie Hathaway, whose charming personality has made her a great favourite on the films. Besides these three characters, Douglas Payne has also a principal part as the villain of the story, whilst his work in the production and preparing the film for exhibition has been considerable.

It is understood that the Big Four Famous Productions is already preparing for its second big picture, and that its activities will not necessarily be confined to the British Isles.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

I AM asked to draw the attention of artists members to the fact that it is to their benefit to use the club as continuously as possible, so that directors and agents can be certain of finding artistes when they want them hurriedly. Several directors have engaged artistes at the club, and I was there on Wednesday when Humberstone Wright engaged his whole cast of seven on the premises. But the Club will not be so valuable to directors and agents if they are not certain of finding plenty of artistes there when they are wanted.

Social functions are going strong. The dance last Saturday was a success and the whist drive greatly enjoyable. To-night (Saturday) there will be another dance, to which members may bring as many as three guests (members free, guests two-and-sixpence each). And to-morrow there will be another of the highly popular concerts for which Dick Webb is responsible. Offers of help should be made to him.

The latest venture is quite a novel one. On Friday, February 24, a billiard match between ladies and gentlemen will be held. This will be highly popular, and those wishing to compete should hand their names in at the office.

The Sports Committee is busy with arrangements for all kinds of sports for the spring and summer months, and to this end the Kinema Club Sports Club is to be formed. Members interested in tennis, golf, football, cricket, billiards, swimming and boxing are asked to hand in their names at the office.

On Wednesday the Daily Express almost issued a "Kinema Club Special Number." It contained a long article, two paragraphs in "Beachcomber's" column, and a leading article, all about our club. Its tributes were very generous, and G. A. Atkinson, the Express kinema representative, who is also one of our members, is to be congratulated on the brilliance of his work.

* * *

In the leading article are the following generous statements:—"Just now there is great distress in the Kinema, as in every other branch of the entertainment world. But these artistes, like their colleagues of the theatre, meet trouble with a smiling face. It is worth noting that actors, who are always the first to help the cause of charity, are also the last to ask charity for themselves. Not for them doles and processions to Trafalgar Square. They still cling to the unfashionable ideas of self-help and private initiative. That does not mean that their suffering is less. The public owes a great debt of gratitude to the brave, uncompensated people who cater for their amusement. They do more than amuse. They show the public how to bear misfortune with dignity and courage."

A. Harding Steerman writes:—

As chairman of the Rules Committee I claim the privilege of supplementing the reply of the secretary to Max Freeman's somewhat gratuitous strictures upon the result of our work.

Mr. Freeman, on his own confession, has not studied the rules, but, further, he is apparently entirely ignorant of the conditions under which they were framed, and I would respectfully suggest that before condemning them he might have taken the trouble to ascertain from the secretary what those conditions were. That is the least he could have done.

Even if he had given a little thought to my remarks at the meeting of "All the Committees" on Friday, February 3, he might have saved himself the totally unnecessary trouble of forming a schedule of rules in which there is not one single suggestion that is new and which had not been thoroughly discussed by the Committee before the rules as printed were submitted to the Executive for ratification.

CLIFT ACTIVE

Denison Clift, whose latest production of "Bentley's Conscience," starring Robert Loraine, has proved so very successful, is now actively at work on the big productions that he has planned for England.

Mr. Clift, in a recent address before the Stoll Picture Theatre Club, said that he believed that British stories should be made in England, and nowhere else; and according to his convictions he will at once produce "Diana of the Crossways," by George Meredith; his own dramatic version of "Mary Queen of Scots," with Fay Compton as Mary Stuart; and Clemence Dane's great play, "A Bill of Divorcement," which has made a success both on the London and New York stage.

The first to go into production is "Diana of the Crossways," a classic beloved the world over. He is going to take the company to the real Crossways.

"Mary Queen of Scots" is complete in scenario form, and will make one of the most powerful and colourful dramatic stories ever filmed. Mr. Clift will depend upon the romance, the dramatic power, and the deep tragedy to move the public.

"A Bill of Divorcement" will offer a superb opportunity for great dramatic acting. He will have a cast of high quality for this picture.

Mr. Clift is now starting the first of these subjects, "Diana," at the Ideal Studio at Elstree, and this picture will be released by Ideal in May.

The facts are as follow:—At the meeting of prospective members, convened by the organisers of the Club, and held on Sunday, December 11, certain resolutions regarding the Governing Body were passed, and it was I who during the discussion suggested the Council which Mr. Freeman refers to, and which suggestion was not adopted. Notwithstanding this, at the second meeting held by the Rules Committee I presented the draft of a rule for the Governing Body, precisely on the lines laid down by Mr. Freeman, but was informed that the basis of all the rules must be in accordance with the resolutions passed by the meeting on that Sunday, the Committee had no alternative therefor but to go ahead, although absolutely against my own convictions, and, I believe, of others of my colleagues.

This was the gist of my remarks at the meeting of "All the Committees," which Mr. Freeman quite ignores. That I was perfectly right was amply proved by the unqualified approval of our hon. solicitor.

I submit this explanation in justice to the Rules Committee, which worked very hard and in loyalty to the Sunday resolutions, and it is very discouraging to the zeal of that body, and especially to myself, who spent days and days of my leisure time (apart from the regular meetings) in framing the rules, to find all our ideas calmly appropriated and put forward as original by somebody else.

In conclusion, allow me to congratulate the secretary on his very able reply to Mr. Freeman, with which I entirely agree, but whereas the secretary refrains from criticism, I unhesitatingly state that an Executive of 45 is not unwieldy. My experience is that it is highly improbable there would ever be a full meeting, but even if there were, a capable chairman could easily deal with it or with twice the number. The meeting on February 3, held in most difficult circumstances, was kept thoroughly well in hand, in spite of what I should imagine were almost unprecedented conditions.

CHAPTER VIII.

AT THE TRADE SHOW.

They found a couple of seats behind a very stout old lady, who was eating peppermints. Just as they sat down, she turned to her neighbour and said, in a hoarse fat whisper, "Do you cry?"

Her neighbour—who was a size smaller—admitted that she did sometimes.

"I do—always!" said the stout old lady, in a tone of infinite superiority, and settled herself down comfortably in anticipation.

"There you are," whispered the Comedian to Alice. "Opportunity for weeping!" Then he added—to himself, Alice thought—"My God, yes! And wailing! And gnashing of teeth!"

All of a sudden the lights went out, and the words "ALICE IN WONDERLAND" were projected on a screen at the end of the Hall. Then came a picture of a little girl sitting on a bank. "Oh, it's me!" cried Alice. "It's me, and I'm moving. . . Oh, but I must never smile!" she said a moment later. "Do I smile like that? And I don't think I'd better frown, either," she added.

The pictures came and went, and Alice's head got smaller, and smaller. "If Mr. Burns had heard about Trade Shows, he'd never have written that bit about 'seeing ourselves as others see us,'" she thought. "Why on earth can't I keep my hands still? . . . Oh, I can't really look like that when I laugh!"

On and on went the pictures, inexorably; smaller and smaller grew Alice's head. "And if it gets any smaller," thought Alice, desperately, "It won't be big enough to keep my eyes open." She tried, honestly she tried, but her head got so small it pressed her eyelids down, and down . . . and down . . .

The next thing she knew was that she heard a voice calling: "I've got the sole rights! I've got the sole rights!"

"Why we're starting all over again from the beginning," she thought, and opened her eyes, hurriedly, in sheer desperation. She was sitting on a grassy bank by the side of the road. In the distance was an old man pushing a barrow full of fruit. "Apricots, all ripe!" he was calling. "Apricots, all ripe!"

"I must have been dreaming," said Alice to herself. "Let's see, where was I? Oh! I know!" she went on as memory gradually returned. "I dreamed I was a Kinema Star! And it's only an old man, offering me fruit!" . . .

And, curiously enough, I know quite a lot of people who have dreamed they were Kinema Stars, and when they have awakened, the answer hasn't even been an apricot!

(Concluded.)

With the conclusion of the "Alice in Film-land" feature we have made arrangements with Hugh E. Wright to commence a new series of effusions from his pen. These will all be in the well-known strain of satire and humour.

SCREEN VALUES MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"Simple Simon"

Hepworth—Directed by Henry Edwards—Starring Henry Edwards, Chrissie White, Mary Dibley—Scenario, by W. Courtenay Rowden and Henry Edwards.

A FINE production, which should mark another step forward in British productions. The production has been well done, and is remarkably true to life.

Henry Edwards has done well in taking care not to exaggerate, and yet fully to exploit every incident. The whole picture is most convincing, and is a credit to its director and the company that made it.

* * *

The acting is natural and spontaneous. Henry Edwards has created a lovable study, which is clever, and at the same time realistic.

Chrissie White's performance is up to her usual high standard, while Mary Dibley gives a fine interpretation of her part.

The minor roles have all been well cast.

* * *

The plot is an excellent one, and the continuity is good.

The photography is magnificent. The lighting of the exteriors and the beautiful exteriors greatly enhance the picture.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Excellent.

LEADS: Very good.

SUPPORTS: Good.

SCENARIO: Good.

CONTINUITY: Good.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Magnificent.

LIGHTING: Fine.

EXTERIORS: Beautiful.

INTERIORS: Well done.

"The House of Peril"

Thompson—Starring Fay Compton—Directed by Kenelm Foss—Supports—Flora Le Breton, Roy Travers, A. B. Imeson, Madeleine Seymour, J. Nelson Ramsay, Irene Tripod, Blanche Walker, Wallace Bosco, George Bellamy, Hubert Carter, David Hallett, Jeff Barlow, Lewis Gilbert, Thos. Canning, Arthur Helmore, Tom Coventry, David Falcke, William Armstrong, Nellie Ganthony, Madge Tree, Madame Odette—Scenario by Kenelm Foss—Photographed by John Parker—Edited by John Muller—Interiors by T. G. Gilson.

* * *

SOMEWHERE near the end of the second reel the drama commences, but is soon obscured again, leaving a sense of disappointment. There are a few good points in the production, but it has to be regretfully confessed that "The House of Peril" is anything but an advance in British motion picture production: films like this were produced ten years ago. This fact is all the more exasperating in view of the excellent material that Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes novel affords for filming purposes. Had the angle taken been a kind of feminine innocent abroad, there would have been ample opportunity for Fay Compton to evidence her histrionic abilities, as it is—Fay Compton in a crude melodrama!

* * *

Kenelm Foss is a scenarist of proved worth, and in directing "The House of Peril" he suggests that the writing of scenarios is his forte rather than the direction of productions. The Casino settings are not convincing, and the introduction of the conventional "mystery house" is a reversion to the methods of pre-war productions. The scenario seems good enough to provide the basis of a good photoplay had there been a more skilful attempt at characterisation. The finale is very poor.

* * *

It is no fault of Fay Compton's that the part of Sylvia is not a huge success. As a matter of fact, it is due to bad casting. Miss Compton is not suited to the part, although she undoubtedly saves it from being the failure it might have been by reason of the skill of her performance.

Flora Le Breton's appearance was disappointingly slight: she is a capable actress, and a more prominent part would have been preferable.

Madeleine Seymour is one of the successes: she invests her part with real artistry and submits a convincing performance.

A. B. Imeson yields to the temptation to exaggerate, which is to be deplored, in view of the frequency with which he plays opposite Miss Compton. No doubt, he is over-anxious to impart realism to the part of the French Count.

Praise is due to Irene Tripod for her flawless performance as Frau Wachner. She reveals undoubted ability and a sympathetic weight into the part.

* * *

John Parker's photography is quite good, and he has shown a good sense of pictorial values in his selection and elimination.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Below average.

LEAD: Work good but unsuited.

SUPPORTS: Average, with one or two outstanding.

LITERARY: Scenario good, continuity fair.

INTERIORS: Fair.

EXTERIORS: Good.

LIGHTING: Adequate.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Best part of production.

WHAT DID YOU DO IN THE—year that is past? You may know, but no one else does. Did you play in one production or in a hundred? Did you play character parts or comedy?

Anyhow, you have been in the profession long enough to know that no one ever gained much in the entertainment world by hiding his light under a bushel. To be fair to yourself you should tell everybody of what you have done. Publicity is your breath of life.

If you think your work is so well known that you need not keep advertising it, give an eye to the vast amount of advertising that the Underground does—everybody knows the Underground and its work, and yet it spends thousands of pounds in advertising.

You must tell the profession what you have done and what you can do—apply to this office for advertising rates in the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO, which circulates throughout every British and American studio.

PHOTOGRAPHY COUNTS

IN the making of a successful picture there are three things that must be given a great deal of consideration, for without any one of these three things it is quite impossible to make a picture that will be considered good. The three essentials are Plot, Production and Photography.

Plot and production are usually given a great deal of consideration, therefore we will pass on to the least heard of and the most important—photography.

When a firm goes out to film a super-production the directors start counting their money. The plot takes a great deal of the money; artistes take more; cost of sets, the director, the light, the studio and a few other things take what remains; and then last of all the company realises that it is necessary, if it would have a picture, to engage a cameraman.

So, grumbling and grouching at this additional expense, the company's heads reluctantly part with a few pounds. They look aghast at the well-known cameraman whose work is known to be good, who demands twenty or twenty-five pounds a week before he will accept the engagement. The man who knows little of camera work and who asks for six or seven pounds is the one who usually gets the job.

What a saving has thus been effected.

And yet—what a waste!

The production takes eight weeks. Each week, by getting a cheap cameraman, nearly ten pounds is saved in wages. But a fact very often overlooked is that the man who can work for a small salary is only doing so because he is not good enough to demand a big one. Every day that he spends with the company he is wasting not only good film, but all that money spent on the plot, all that money expended on sets, directors, artistes and studios. His work will be of the kind that even if it does not spoil the film entirely, will considerably lessen its value on the market. For bad photography can harm a picture more than even bad plot or bad production.

If directors can afford to spend money on the other necessities of production they can afford to spend it on getting a good cameraman. Even when a picture is a success simply because of the photography, it is seldom that the cameraman gets credit for it, for the praise is showered on the director.

STEREOSCOPY

by T. H. PEMBERTON.

There are many aids that may be called into play in the production of stereoscopic films, principally direct methods introduced in the shape of mechanical contrivances. Then there is the influence of colour, of which every one is cognisant, colour imparting to the film a stereoscopic value (apart from the beauty of colour). A decided value in the above direction is introduced into the picture. A tinted film will sufficiently demonstrate this characteristic, and the effect produced by a well-thought-out light treatment, aiming firstly at a diffused daylight effect, and then introducing effective extras.

Every scene requires separate and individual treatment to bring out and emphasise those qualities the director is aiming to portray. A little more attention might be usefully directed to the manner of light treatment in projecting pictures upon the screen.

I have met with instances where the picture has appeared like animated outlines, so intense has been the illuminant and on other occasions, I have witnessed results that would rank as veritable masterpieces in monochromatic productions.

With this consciousness of the want of decided stereoscopic values, there came to me an intense desire to improve films, if possible, in this direction, and my efforts in this direction have not been in vain. I have not aimed at exaggerated reliefs, but have laboured to reproduce scenes as nature presents them to normal vision, although, of course, it is quite possible for one to get a wrong or exaggerated impression of what in reality is meant when one speaks of stereoscopic values. Most of the effects produced to be viewed through a stereoscope undoubtedly, from my experience, should be entered in the category of abnormal values, if we must take as our standard the impressions received by a person of normal vision, and this, I think, should be our point of view when speaking generally of stereoscopic values in films.

One should aim to impart to the picture a sense of atmosphere, perspective, and a gradual toning down of objects as they retire from the foreground, registering a relative value in size that will coincide with their position in the picture, also giving detail and depth, in short, a decided stereoscopic value; or, in other words, recording upon the screen a natural representation of the original scene exciting in the mind of the observer, the same impressions that would be experienced when viewing the original scene with normal vision.

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

ACCORDING to arrangements made some time back, the Kine. Cameramen's Society will hold its dinner this year when George Woods-Taylor, the secretary, arrives back from India, which will not be very long now.

P. Dennis gave a very interesting lecture on dye-toning at the last meeting of the K.C.S. His statements were interesting and led to a great deal of discussion. So successful was the lecture that it is intended to hold another shortly.

It is interesting to note that of all the cameramen who will photograph the wedding of Princess Mary, most of them will belong to the K.C.S. Members of the K.C.S. who are out of work on the day of the wedding should communicate with the secretary, who will no doubt be able to fix them up. They should also make a point of keeping in close touch with the secretary, for things are beginning to look brighter now, and he is always notified of any jobs going.

It has been arranged that members out of employment should not have to pay the Society the usual subscription, and when they find work, they will not be called upon to pay subscriptions for the weeks they were out of work.

CAMERAMEN AT WORK

IT has been suggested that films of important events should be preserved for the benefit of posterity. One film that it would be well to preserve is the "Topical" photographs of the handing over of Dublin Castle to the new Irish Government and the preliminary stages of the evacuation of Ireland by the British troops. In days to come, this picture will be of real historical interest, and the same applies to a number of other pictures taken recently.

Basil Emmott is named as the cameraman who will film the Gaumont super-production, "Byron." He has been studying the script for the last few weeks, and has planned most of his shots.

A. Kingston's talking films were the subject of an article in one of the American Trade papers. In addition to this, "Around the Town" contained a screen interview with Kingston and his sound photography apparatus.

John J. Cox, of Stoll's, left for Switzerland last Thursday, where he will film the exteriors of "Running Water," a picture which contains a lot of snow stuff. Before leaving, Cox purchased a fine Alpine outfit.

Justified Criticism.

ONE of the criticisms levelled against British productions is that the quality of acting is poor. Recently one of our leading directors stated that the number of real film artistes in this country did not exceed the fingers of one hand. While this is an exaggeration, it must be admitted that there is a certain measure of truth in the criticism. Unfortunately we have, be it confessed, very few known film artistes. And consequently British productions on the whole are below the histrionic standard of most American and Continental films. This fact must be faced and not cowardly avoided. And the only way to avoid a continuance of the evil is to seek to discover causes and then to make operative a remedial measure. In our opinion the causes of the poverty of histrionic ability on the British screen are fourfold.

Repression.

IN the first place, we feel that one cause is as fundamental as national heredity. British girls are not, normally and naturally, temperamental. Our national social system has been directed to repressing the exhibition of real emotion, with the result that expression is naturally and instinctively checked until the power of soul-expression—emotion-expression—becomes paralysed by disuse. We say this deliberately: it is our hope that the newer screen artiste will learn right now the vital lesson that to be a successful stage or screen artiste the facility for giving rein to one's emotions must be cultivated. It has been said of the English race that we are naturally and hereditarily phlegmatic, unmoved and unmovable by the tragedies of humanity. And this repression of the capacity for emotion may be at the root of the difficulty there is in finding the histrionic talent that our studios need. The Latins by birth and the Americans by breeding alone seem capable of portraying the delicate shades of emotion: probably because of the Saxon strain in the English race we seem able merely to express those broad and obvious emotions and pathetically incapable of giving expression to the hundred fine gradations of soul-feeling that is the hallmark of the true artiste.

* * *

The Great Undiscovered.

THEN we are convinced that the star system is one of the contributory causes to the present dearth of real screen talent. Some of our so-called stars are such not so much by virtue of the quality of their own work as by virtue of the quality of their publicity agent's work—sweet are the uses of advertisement. Having, by dint of full-pages and pars., become famous and firmly established on the self-erected pedestal, they are booked, boomed and boosted month after month as being world-recognised stars. Film after film, synopsis after synopsis, journal after journal, announce the superlative quality of their work, when all the time there are in their supporting casts infinitely better artistes than they will ever be even if they live as long as Methuselah. This pernicious "star system" is funnel-like in its effect and at the bottom is a crowd of clever artistes, with potential or latent talent which can never be given to the world or to the badly-needed improvement of British productions because the "star" is at the top and there's only room for one there. The hope for the future is that British producing concerns will follow the Americans who are putting the stranglehold on the star system and giving The Great Undiscovered a chance to reveal their hidden talent.

Real Histrionics

AND now we reach the third cause, and one which all who think at all agree is of vital importance. We definitely assert that the policy on the part of directors of choosing "types" instead of artistes is having a disastrous effect on the histrionic properties of our productions. When a bank clerk is wanted, the tendency is to go out into the street to find a bank clerk, pay him ten guineas a week and allow him to look an inane idiot on the celluloid; all the time there are artistes of recognised worth who have become proficient in the arts of make-up and characterisation who could act the part with consummate skill, conviction and polish. That is the function of an artiste: to clothe himself with the personality of the character and live it. We have among our artistes men and women who can transform their face and transfigure their personality at a moment's notice: in the old London days, artistes would be clergymen one day, old crossing-sweepers the next, and young subalterns the next—triumphs of make-up and characterisation. And it can be done in these days. What the British film needs is less type and more artistry. Good acting, screen technique, and a sound knowledge of making-up are the great virtues that artistes possess and types never can.

* * *

Directorial Domination.

FINALLY, we have to state that much harm is being done by the domination of the director. It is not fair nor just to the artiste to condemn him for the inferior quality of his work when all the time he has been carrying out the instructions of the director. Recently we strongly criticised the work of an artiste, stating that he was exaggerating and over-emphasising all the time. The artiste called in at this office later and explained that when he gave what he considered a well-proportioned performance the director cried: "Oh! for goodness sake put some move into it. Give me this . . ."; and he proceeded to show the artiste how to—over-act! Such domination is directed to the ultimate undoing of the director's own work and is reacting in the disfavour of British productions. It is not possible for the director, of course, to let the artiste do as he likes, but an intelligent director will let the artiste know what the "situation" is and leave him to play it.

HIGH-BROW FILM TALK

Gilbert K. Chesterton as a lecturer and Hilaire Belloc as a chairman formed very strong attractions at last Wednesday's meeting of the Stoll Picture House Club, and there was a full attendance.

The Chairman opened with a vigorous appeal for the film as a teacher of history. And you could, he said, change the whole teaching of elementary mathematics, of tactics, and of strategy by the kinema.

Gilbert K. Chesterton opened by saying that the only interest he could claim was that he was in some sense a brand plucked from the burning, as he was a very recent convert to the kinema.

His suspicions began when he found a large number of public bodies and social reformers said that the film was immoral and must be expurgated. He knew then there must be something good and Christian-like about it. The kind of things that people said should be cut out of the films were almost always the only honest and moral things that could be made into entertainment. It could represent theft in its more creditable aspects, such as burglary, which at least called for the exercise of certain virtues—courage, daring, and loyalty to comrades. Better that people should see this than be introduced to it through watching the modern politician or financier. He did not know whether anybody had thought of making a film on the doings of these latter, and he did not think it would be as entertaining as a burglary.

A great deal could be done on the film which the newspaper could not or would not do. Such evils as belonged to newspapers and kinemas alike were the results of the unfortunate plutocratic society in which we live, but the kinema had a certain advantage in having started clear of the many hypocrosies and compromises of the Victorian time. One was that newspapers could never possibly give a vivid and real picture of the inside of politics.

You could, unfortunately, use mobs nowhere else than on the film, but there have been times in our history when mobs well worth filming have displayed their beneficent energies. There was a neglected period that might be called the Cobbett period—the period of the Luddite riots—the democracy that rose at the beginning of the 19th century. A great film could be made about the figure of Cobbett and the great and picturesque things that happened in those times.

The reason for the neglect of this period was very considerably due to two things—Cobbett was opposed to the new industrial state and the merchants, and he was opposed to the squire and the agricultural aristocracy. One could hardly do better than give really vigorous pictures of that great writer, riding through the English shires.

Answering a question put by Fred Wright, from the body of the meeting, Mr. Chesterton said his way to get out of the difficulty suggested by the liability of any one historian to present a biased story, would be to employ two producers. This was humorously challenged by the questioner, who chose to read into it the suggestion that two producers would be working on one film.

FLAT-CATCHERS CAUGHT

The trial was continued before the Common Serjeant at the Old Bailey of Oxford William Welding, film director, and Jessie Marion Quigley, dancing mistress, charged with conspiring to obtain money by false pretences in connection with the London Cinema Academy of Acting and Dancing, which they carried on at 207, Shaftesbury Avenue.

Horace Ward Collings, of Rye, Sussex, said he saw the advertisement of the Academy in October and saw "Mrs Granville," the name used by Mrs. Quigley. He agreed to have a ten-guinea course of lessons in acting.

Mr. Collings said that he was told by Mrs. Quigley that the film was to be produced by the Belgian Government, but it would be necessary for him to take a twenty-guinea course of dancing in order to get the part. He would then get about £30 a week.

He added that he paid the twenty guineas and got one lesson in Grecian dancing.

Mrs. Quigley next recommended a course of riding lessons for a part in a small film, and he paid ten guineas for these. He only had two riding lessons. He also paid £15 for clothes.

Mrs. Quigley, in the witness box, in answer to Mr. Byrne for Welding, asserted that she carried on a perfectly genuine business and never tried to obtain money by false pretences. She was the sole proprietress and Welding had only been an instructor for three months, since about June. For this she paid him £10 per week. She said that the cheques she received from various people were paid into Welding's account at the bank so that he could repay witness at some future time. Welding knew nothing whatever about the business.

Witness said the figures referred to in the profit and loss account were prepared when it was proposed to form the Academy into a company. The expenses were estimated, but the fees, amounting to £2,482, were actual receipts from pupils in ten months.

Counsel: Did you get any one of them an engagement?—No, and I never promised one. They would have to go to an employment agency for that. We were not an employment agency.

She added that between three and four hundred pupils went through the Academy last year. Some of them paid only six guineas, whilst others paid fifty guineas for the full course.

The jury found both prisoners guilty.

The Common Serjeant, in passing sentence, said defendants had been found guilty of deliberate, systematic and cruel frauds. He sentenced the woman to nine, and the man to fifteen months' imprisonment in the second division.

YOUR CORNER

Replying to Stephen Wing in reference to my article on "How Artistes Spoil Themselves," to use Mr. Wing's own words, it might have been as well had he looked at the subject from every point of view himself before rushing into print.

For his information may I point out that I was invited by the editor to submit an article on this subject and no one with a sufficiently broad mind could or would have taken exception to my remarks, which were in no sense intended as a rebuke to anyone, even the chief offenders.

I am quite happy to leave it to those artistes who know me to say whether they prefer the Manliness of certain other gentlemen in this branch of the profession, when called upon, to my UNMANLINESS in sheltering behind a literary effort.

I was much amused by the clever drawing, which gave great joy to my schoolboy son.—MAX ROMA.

On the cover of the first number of this very excellent paper may be read these words:—"The Organ of all Concerned in the Production of British Motion Pictures."

This being so, I feel constrained to protest against the use of that American importation, the word "Director," as applied to the person who is producing a picture here in Britain. Over here we have always looked upon this person as the "Producer," looked upon this person as the "Producer" and I feel sure that ninety-nine people out of a hundred connected with the British studios always know to whom you refer if you use the word "Producer." The American term can only lead to confusion. The term "Director" over here is used almost solely in connection with those gentlemen who form the Boards of Management of Companies; even then it is necessary to differentiate between the Directors and the Managing Director. Already we have the Casting Director and Art Director, don't let us make "confusion worse confounded." There is no need for two words such as Producing Director where one is sufficient. "Producer" conveys a much better meaning than "Director," and is thoroughly understood by all British people connected with the stage or kinema.

In this, our own paper, you may see that the gentlemen referred to use the word "Producer" in their cards—this prevails also in other papers—and I am confident if a vote were taken of those gentlemen who are stated to be forming an Association for Directors, it would be unanimously in favour of an Association of Producers.—A HARDING STEERMAN.

[We have every hope that the future of British productions will so improve that those who are responsible for them will be generally regarded as Directors and not Producers. Photoplays are not like the conjuror's rabbits—just produced. They have to be more than produced—they have to be directed. The fault of the past has been that British films have been produced by a professional producer instead of being directed by an artistic direction. If those gentlemen who are now responsible for British productions desire to remain merely producers of films instead of directors of photoplays, we shall despair of the future.—EDITOR, M.P.S.]

THE VERB "TO SQUIB."

Just a line to tell you of a new coined word and expression I heard yesterday outside the Blue Hall, Hammersmith, where our picture "Squibs" has been showing the whole week.

One man greeted a friend thusly:—"Hullo! Are you 'squibbing' to-night?"—E. L. LAUSTE.

High Lights

Intimate Studio Gossip

Yet another member of the profession to turn his attention to racing is Arthur Rooke. His love of animals is well known, so I am not surprised to hear that he is getting together one or two thoroughbreds, his latest purchase being "Cumberland." We shall certainly hope in the near future to see his "colours"—namely, all black, white hooped sleeves and red cap, successful—more particularly so as it is the sincere love of a good horse and not the "roar of the ring" that appeals to him.

* * *

Bernard Bromhead is not alone in his glory—Clive Brooke this week is rejoicing in the advent of a son, and J. Brohame, Hardy's studio manager, doing ditto over a daughter. These two additions to the film fraternity arrived Thursday and Friday respectively.

* * *

I regret to say that I have received news, from Genoa, Italy, of the death of the father of Adelqui Millar, the well-known lead in Granger-Binger Productions.

Edward R. Gordon informs me that on Thursday last he commenced work on the first of his series of subjects of the Mutual Films, a film company which has been lately formed. Another new company is Quality Films, which is making a series of one-reel subjects based on the stories appearing in the monthly magazine, Pan. The Quality Film Company has engaged the Screenplay's Studio to produce in and will do one subject a week. George A. Cooper is directing and Sydney Folker is studio manager.

* * *

On Saturday last the managing director of the Union Film Co., Ltd. (J. D. Drury) had a narrow escape from being severely injured whilst out on exterior work for a comedy entitled "Levity and Laity," one of a series which the company is producing at its Liverpool studios. On the journey out to the location the car in which he was travelling skidded rather badly, resulting in one of the front wheels parting from the axle, throwing Mr. Drury out into the road, when he was exceedingly lucky to be only slightly bruised about the hands and legs. The other occupants of the car, the publicity manager (N. A. Morton), and the director (W. Drury), and the chauffeur escaped without injury. The car was quickly repaired, and within a very short time things were quite normal again, and everything went off according to schedule.

* * *

H. B. Parkinson has assembled a fine cast for his new five-reeler, "Trapped by the Mormons," which he has just completed at the Teddington Studios. Evelyn Brent, Lewis Willoughby, Ward McAllister, Cecil Morton York, Olaf Hytten, Olive Sloane and George Wynn are mentioned as playing leading parts. The picture, Mr. Parkinson assures me, has already been well booked up, despite the fact that it has not yet been Trade shown, and it will be released in Manchester on March 6. The first London show will be held on March 13. The picture has benefited by a great deal of propaganda which has appeared in most of the leading weekly and daily newspapers.

We regret to announce the sudden death of Bannister Merwin, the well-known scenarist and director. Mr. Merwin underwent an operation at St. Thomas's Hospital which was successful, but almost immediately afterwards he expired. An appreciation of his work will appear in our next issue.

I understand that Captain Calvert is still seeking an ideal Byron for his production of the great poet's life story. The actor who plays the part will have one of the hardest rôles—and one of the biggest opportunities—ever given to a screen player. Twenty people have already been interviewed, and tested before the camera. In addition, there are over forty characters that have to be most carefully cast, and, as most of these are well-known figures, the same difficulty of finding people with facial resemblance to the originals is being encountered. A great number of these supporting characters have already been found, but some of the most important feminine rôles have still to be filled. Meanwhile, Captain Calvert has already commenced on some of the subsidiary scenes for which he has his characters complete.

* * *

The Hardy Film Co. has just entered into an agreement with the Amalgamated Press to film a series of one-reel subjects dealing with the adventures of Billy Bunter. Billy Bunter, a fat boy, is the name of one of the principal characters in the public school stories being run in a number of popular boys' magazines. The pictures will be released serially and are being started on immediately. As most of the characters appearing in this series are schoolboys, this should be a fine chance for some of our younger artistes to shine.

Flora Roma, whose name in private life is Florence Romer, was taking part, recently, in the production of "The Bohemian Girl" at the Alliance Studios, and was asked several times if she was related to Max Roma. Whilst appreciating the honour thus done her, she desires to make it generally known that she is not in any way whatever related to the well known and popular agent, and that she adopted her stage name of Flora Roma before she had even heard of Max Roma.

Bert Wynne is anxious to get in touch with well known artistes who would like to help to make a success of the Trade Carnival to be held at Manchester on March 8. Will artistes willing to go up to Manchester on this occasion communicate with Bert Wynne at his office in Wardour Street?

SONGS ON KINE SUBJECTS V.—STILL MORE MAXIMS OF HAFIZ (Still further after Kipling) by HUGH E. WRIGHT

LET the Director be humble, though he be Boss of the Show;
Not talking tosh of "his puppets"—Actors are human,
you know.

Let us work "with" him, not "for" him, playing parts of a whole.
If we're but Marionettes, tell me this—Can the Play have a Soul?

I.

"The ways of man with a maid be strange," for Kipling has told us so,
But they're nothing compared with the ways—and means—of a Kinema Studio.

II.

Son! If I, Hafiz, thy father, ask thee at close of the day,
Begging on knees that are bended, to give me a part in thy play,
Send me to Hell!—if relationship be thy sole reason for "Yea."

III.

If she grow suddenly gracious. Reflect, and avoid destruction.
It may be love; but the chances are, it's a part in your next production.

IV.

Beware of the Head which is swollen; shun ye the babble of pride.
But—put your goods in the window, and ask 'em to step inside.
As the shifting gold of the desert sands, or the loot in a deep-sea coffer,
Is the gold which you pay for Advertisement, if you haven't the goods to offer.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

The Rules Committee has been busily engaged in making some necessary revisions to the rules which experience has proved to be necessary. Later a general meeting will be called to approve these.

* * *

Arthur Walcott is startling everybody these days by his extreme youthfulness. He dances every Saturday like a young two-year-old, plays bridge like a pro, and dazzles all in the billiard-room by the brilliancy of his snooker.

* * *

Every member who knows is wanting to congratulate Billie Bristow on her recent terpsichorean achievement. She started dancing at three in Glasgow and danced her way from Glasgow to London, and finished dancing at midnight in the Club—a distance of 400 miles and eight hours. (And to add to her laurels, it must be noted that her dancing partner was—Fred Wright!)

* * *

All members are asked to note the rule respecting approaching directors with requests for engagements. The Executive Committee is going to take very strong action in the case of all delinquents.

* * *

The concert had a two and a half hours' continuous run, and the artistes included Joan Lockton, Florence Shee, Eva Llewellyn, Elsie Donalds, Beryl Rigg, George Ridgwell, Sydney Paxton, A. B. Imeson, Norman MacDonald and Frank Grey. Dick Webb presided.

* * *

To-night (Saturday) a special dance is being held, to which members may bring guests (members free, guests 2s. 6d.) Fancy or evening dress is optional.

* * *

To-morrow (Sunday) another of the popular whist drives will be held, and prizes will be offered to both ladies and gentlemen. Tickets for the drive are two-and-six each, and members may bring guests.

* * *

During the next few days the Entertainment Committee will have completed arrangements for two sweepstakes which will be held in connection with the Lincoln and the Grand National.

* * *

Victor Seastrom, the Swedish film director, was one of the most notable visitors to the Club during the week. He is in London on holiday, but managed to find time to lunch at the Club and to express his pleasure and surprise at finding such a place in London.

* * *

Monday of this week was one of the busiest days the Club has experienced, for during the day more names were entered on the hall porter's book than ever before, excepting, of course, the memorable opening night. It all goes to show that the club is growing more popular day by day, and that artistes are showing their appreciation of the place by supporting it as much as possible.

* * *

J. Stuart Blackton is becoming quite a frequent visitor; twice during the first three days of the week he popped in for lunch.

The dance last Saturday night went off remarkably well. There were more people present than on the Saturday previous.

* * *

The Sports Committee is anxious to have the names of all the athletic members in the Club who indulge in such recreations as golf, football, cricket, swimming, boxing, tennis, etc. If those members who are interested in sport would send their names along the work of the Committee would be greatly reduced.

* * *

Humberstone Wright, who engaged the whole of his staff in "Creation" at the Club, writes to the Secretary the following interesting letter:—

"My first impression of the Kinema Club was one of surprise and delight to see the wonderful work that had been done in so limited a time, and was a delight to meet my brother and sister artistes in such charming surroundings and to be able to fill up my catt in the Club for my forthcoming production, "Creation," for the Raleigh King Productions, Torquay. Hoping to still further my acquaintance with the Kinema Club, and wishing it the success it deserves."

* * *

Will all directors, casting directors and agents please note that the telephone number of the Club is Regent 2131? Artistes are advised to use the Club as often as possible, so that if they are required for productions they can readily be found by directors and agents.

* * *

The attention of members is drawn to the fact that the Executive Committee is now engaged in preliminaries consequent upon the Kinema Club Production. Already a meeting with the heads of some of the producing concerns has been held, and this has been followed by a conference of scenario writers. Those present at this conference discussed the outline of the scheme, and ultimately decided to adjourn for a week, in which time each would originate some theme or subject for the film. And there the matter stands for the moment.

* * *

But it is necessary to explain to members that the Club cannot be financed on members' subscriptions: some of the proceeds of the picture will be earmarked for this. It is also intended to set £5,000 aside to form a Benevolent Fund for the relief of unemployed artistes and others. In other words, the picture is being made for the sole benefit of the members. In view of this fact, it is expected that the members will not hesitate to offer their services for the picture, and to play any part for which they may be selected. Will all who are prepared to do their utmost in this direction communicate with the Secretary?

* * *

CARRIED UNANIMOUSLY

Jack Jarman writes:—

Before the Club was actually in existence, a proposition was put forward, that those people who could afford to do so would pay their subscriptions for a life membership.

As this has not met with a very big response, I propose that we in some measure compromise (if I may use the word) in this way: That those of us who can see our way clear will pay our subscriptions for next year as well as for this.

I fully realise that business at the present time is not too flourishing for any of us, but surely if only a few members can help in this respect, it will be of some use to defray the expenses of this first difficult year?

I herewith enclose a cheque in payment of my membership for 1923.

WHO IS THE MEMBER WHO—

drops into the club occasionally, goes all over the premises and if no directors, casting directors or agents are in goes out again?

* * *

objects to the suggestion of a private 'phone box as nobody will then be able to hear her refuse her daily offers?

* * *

displays a portfolio of photographs of himself depicting grief, anger, happiness, etc?

* * *

sits in the lounge with a sad and sorrowful face? AND who is the member who "bit it" and bought him a drink to cheer him up?

* * *

* * *

doesn't patronise the restaurant but prefers chewing the club penholders?

* * *

posts old contracts to himself at the club and then opens them in the lounge if there are enough members present?

* * *

asked for "Woodbines"—no luck—so asked for a half-a-crown cigar and then changed his mind?

* * *

is travelling in an extra special line of grease paints?

* * *

engages a taxi at Leicester Square tube station and drives round to the club in it?

* * *

only discovered this week that there is a ladies floor?

* * *

although he had paid up as a Foundation member, forgot, and sent a further cheque for £5 5s.?

ADDENDA FROM THE SECRETARY.—"But who are the members who have not paid up at all, yet?"

Record of Activities of Kine-Cameramen

ON MINDING YOUR BUSINESS.

THERE are people who regard the cameraman as a person who does not know his business. Perhaps, if the facts were known, the cameraman is one of the few persons in the producing profession who does know his business, and is so interested in it that he has no time to look after other people's. Such cannot be said of many other branches of the business. Some people are given jobs in studios because they cannot get any other kind of work and because the managing director is a friend of theirs. The situations that require skill being usually all filled, a new position is created and the managing director's friend becomes chief supervisor of the studio call boy, with a roving commission and power to interfere with all and sundry.

The managing director's friend will surely forsake this other work to investigate the workings of the mysterious box on three legs, which the man turns while the pictures are being made. The man who turns the handle will immediately come under the eye of the supervisor. His salary will give the supervisor the first shock. For simply turning a handle this cameraman is receiving a "huge" salary.

Then, as the supervisor begins to learn more of the business, he will discover that the cameraman is wasting too much negative, that repairs to the camera are costing too much and such like. But it is certain that, if he intends interfering, the cameraman is the one who will be worried most by him.

Cameramen suffer from other interfering people besides friends of the management. There are still in existence a few directors who think that they know more about the camera than the cameraman does. If this is so, then it is up to them to get a good cameraman. If not, surely the cameraman is one to decide what kind of shots can be taken and what kind cannot, when to take and when not to take and to decide all matters of a technical nature in connection with the camera work.

Interference from the wrong sources is one of the evils of the profession. The other branches suffer, but the worst sufferer is the cameraman. With a little less interfering the profession would run smoother and there would be a lot fewer petty quarrels and a lot more work, and that work would be better, a great deal better than it ever has been.

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

LAST week's meeting of the K.C.S. was a dismal one indeed. The few people who are holding the Society together were present as usual, but it was the usual meagre attendance, which is disheartening even to most enthusiastic members of the K.C.S.

It seems that all the work and all the efforts of these few members is being wasted and that those members, who are selfish enough to stay away, because it does not suit their convenience, are hindering the Society's progress and nullifying the efforts of the few enthusiasts.

It has been suggested that the K.C.S. join the Kinematograph Sports Association. But, as already most of the members of the K.C.S. are members of the K.S.A., through virtue of their firms being members, the suggestion seems to be wasting money. When the matter was discussed at the last meeting no decision was arrived at.

Arthur A. St. Brown tendered his resignation as treasurer of the K.C.S. at Wednesday's meeting. The Chairman requested Mr. Brown to retain the position for the time being, so that the matter could be brought up at a general meeting later. To this suggestion Mr. Brown agreed.

DYE TONING

IN his recent lecture, P. Dennis spoke of the very limited use of dye toning in this country. In America and in Italy, dye toning was used to a greater extent, than in England, and as a result the work of the cameraman was greatly enhanced. For certain light effects dye toning is excellent, and altogether, he thought, our laboratories would do well to take more interest in the subject.

According to Mr. Dennis, the laboratories at the present time are very averse from toning. It takes up too much time and the laboratory will have the toning bath left unused, rather than spend time on toning films. When a film has to be toned and when there is no way out, the job is usually given to an inexperienced boy, who is told to mix up a toning bath and tone the film.

Mr. Dennis was inclined to put down the lack of interest in toning in this country and the disinclination of laboratories to tone films, to the small sums that were being paid laboratories for the work. At the present rate it was impossible to make any profit at the work. If it could only be taken more seriously in this country it would considerably enhance the work that the cameramen were turning out.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

Even in the Club cameramen do not seem to be able to forget their work. The billiards room has become a favourite rendezvous for the cameramen, and already the various accessories which go with a game of "Snooker" have been given technical names. When the long rest is used, it is a long focus shot; soft focus, close-ups, dissolves, mixes and fades-out have been applied to different snooker shots now that the cameramen have taken a hand. From what I have seen of certain cameramen at snooker, the favourite shot seems to be "in off."

* * *

The Around the Town people have been busy with a new ultra-rapid camera, which slows down motion fifteen times. So far it gives the best slowed-down picture I have seen. This week's issue contains some fine shots of a dancer, which were taken in the Gaumont studio.

* * *

Cameramen are marvelling at Charles Rosher's work in Mary Pickford's latest release, "Through the Back Door." I have not yet seen the film, but those who have seen it declare that the photography is wonderful, and speak highly of the cloud effects. One cameraman definitely states that the picture has been taken on pan chromatic stock; which is quite likely, according to the descriptions of the work that I have heard.

* * *

Have just seen some of the stuff Kenneth Gordon took at the Italian Roof Garden the other night, and am inclined to think that it is the best that has so far been accomplished in the way of actually filming interiors of hotels and such-like.

* * *

Business seems to have been very quiet on both the studio and topical sides. The topical men have had very few big events happening during the last fortnight. The studio side, it is pleasing to note, is bucking up a bit, and many cameramen are finding work.

* * *

Bert Ford, whose pet hobby is parallel shooting, has now another vice, snooker. He has taken to the game like a fish takes to water, and up to the time of writing has made a number of scores of anything up to nine. His favourite snooker partner is D. P. Cooper.

* * *

Harold Jeapes and Harold Jones are off to Japan to film the Prince of Wales's tour of the country. George Woods-Taylor, who has been filming the Prince in India, writes me saying that he is returning home in March, and will arrive back in England on Easter Saturday. Taylor's letter contains a few notes about his adventures in India, but he is keeping back the more exciting ones until he arrives home.

STUDIOS FROM WITHIN

What is claimed to be a "practical outline of the artistic and technical work in the production of film plays" comes from the printing presses this month in the form of a manual published by Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons, Ltd., Parker Street, Kingsway, W.C.2. This manual is "Kinematograph Studio Technique," published at 2s. 6d., and the author of which is L. C. MacBean, who is well known in this country as a director and studio manager.

Whilst written, obviously, for tyros, "Kinematograph Studio Technique" also contains many pages that will be of valuable guidance and assistance to directors and artistes. The author supports the view of instructing artistes in all the facts of the story. He says:—

"Those artistes who are taking leading or important part should possess a very intelligent knowledge of the story. This is best imparted to them in synopsis form and not in that of the complete scenario; a method frequently and unadvisedly adopted. The actual explanation of the scene to be dealt with is entirely in the province of the director, who mentally pieces together the several actions as he proceeds. . . . The artistes should be content with the story and not anticipate the action by following the scenario. If the scenes were taken in proper sequence, the matter would be wholly different."

Mr. MacBean asserts that the cameraman should be fully acquainted with the scenario prior to the commencement of the production. In fact, Mr. MacBean appears to have a very high opinion of the value of the cameraman. Throughout his book he establishes the position of the man behind the tripod, and not only gives him valuable hints, but defines some of his duties for him. For instance, he says:—

"It is he who will instruct the studio electrician in placing the lamps in the position necessary to give the best illumination or afford the best lighting effects. Throughout the whole production it is essential that he should work in complete harmony and hand-in-hand with the director. There are four factors in the success (or failure) of a film play—Story, Acting, Direction, and Photography—and in many cases the latter has been the deciding one. Good photography, including what is termed quality, has saved many a picture which has been weak in other respects."

Several pages are devoted to scenario writing, and a facsimile of a scene sheet is also reproduced, as well as a scenario analysis sheet. In view of the controversy as to the co-operation of the scenarist and director, it is well to note what Mr. MacBean says on the subject:—

"From the foregoing pages it should be apparent that a screen playwright should have some knowledge of the actual work of production: he should be acquainted with the possibilities and limitations of the camera as well as those of actual staging; he should have watched the director at work, both inside the studio and whilst engaged on exterior scenes, and he should appreciate the difficulties which arise and the chances and possibilities which so frequently occur and are equally often lost."

That very much overlooked member of the studio staff—the Art Director—is given prominence in this book:—

"The qualifications of an art director are many. He should be a draughtsman and able to design settings for interior scenes, either in ground-plan or perspective form; he should be able to design and sketch costumes; and he should be well acquainted with many subjects and customs which so frequently enter into productions. It is essential, too, that he be well posted in matters of 'period,' as regards architecture, costume, furniture and general conditions."

The work of the scene painter is also dealt with. In this connection the author writes interestingly and informatively on the subject of the medium and colour of flats and accessories. He says:—

"Perhaps the best colour from the general photographic point of view is burnt umber, lightened out with white or darkened with black or Vandyck brown. The binding medium in general use is size. For some purposes, greys composed of black and white in oil, or distemper, are useful, and it is questionable whether, used judiciously, such neutral tints are not more suitable to different kinds of lighting for reasons which will be apparent in the chapter on photography. However, in cases where studios are illuminated by a uniform type of lighting, to which the cameraman has become accustomed, the most satisfactory colouring is brown (otherwise burnt umber) and its agents.

"Notwithstanding the fact that most scenes are built, the work of the studio scenic artist is of no mean importance. His services are continually in requisition and his avocation demands special skill—a combination of artistic genius with practical adaptation to the requirements of photography. Moreover, for instance, painting a scenery backcloth in distemper, in which the tones are quite different when wet from those acquired when dry, has only to be tried by the water-colour artist or painter to be appreciated as the work of a specialist."

Among other hints, Mr. MacBean tells the location manager that it is advisable to make a note of the best time of the day in which to take a particular scene—this, principally, on account of the quality of natural light, and the most suitable angle of the sun's rays. He also advises the location spotter to carry a hand-camera and a sketch-book, and to provide himself with a magnetic compass, a two-foot rule, a view-finder, a map and local guide books.

"When locations are situated in confined areas, and where the suitability of scenic conditions is to be determined, it is desirable to prove whether there is sufficient space for the intended 'shot' or vantage point suitable to the requirements of the camera. For this purpose the ordinary camera view-finder comes into play. As, however, this is sometimes rather a cumbersome article to carry on these expeditions, use can be made of a frame of wood, with an opening proportionate to the size of the camera mask, bearing a string with knots at distances from the frame in the same ratio to the focal lengths of the lenses to be used. On holding the frame at the appropriate distance from the eye, the picture seen through the opening is identical with the camera view."

"The most suitable time of day for taking a particular scene from the point of view of sun-lighting should also be noted. With the aid of the compass this is a simple matter, even on dull days or in the late evening. The clock-face diagram in Fig. 13 of which there is a replica at the end of this book for pasting into a note-book or on to the view-finder) may be of some service either by itself or in conjunction with a compass."

In a subsequent issue we hope to reprint special extracts from Mr. MacBean's book dealing with the artistes' work, scenarios and set-building. In the meantime, readers are advised to secure a copy of the book from the publishers as a guide book and reference for the various duties connected with studio work.

FOURPENCE.

SOMETHING NEW.

Mr. Raleigh King, the moving spirit of the Film Productions of that name (headquarters Watcombe Hall, Torquay) is strongly of the opinion that the picture loving public is crying out for something off the beaten track — for something new! He has endeavoured to supply a long felt want, and believes that "CREATION," adapted from the novel by MAY EDGINTON, will meet the case. The novel came out in serial form in the "DAILY MIRROR" on March 1st. The film is now in the making under the able direction of H. HUMBERSTONE WRIGHT, who has twenty-eight years of stage and screen work to his credit. The stars include DOROTHY FANE, SIR SIMEON STUART, and RALEIGH KING.

The natural scenery of the Devonshire coast, and the splendidly equipped studio, lend themselves in a very marked manner to the making of a super-production.

Read this gripping story of the man with a dual personality, and then see the film.

Bannister Merwin.

AS we went to press with the last issue we received news of the sudden death of Bannister Merwin, and as the mouthpiece of all engaged in the production of British films we desire to place on record the regret of the whole industry that a craftsman of such skill should be cut off in his prime. His passing is a great loss to the profession which he so long adorned. The late Bannister Merwin was one of those who ten years ago were busy laying the foundations of the British film industry as it is to-day and as it will be to-morrow. Not cursed with an undue sense of self-appreciation Merwin went through life unobtrusively and yet all the time contributing considerably to the common weal. And all with whom he came into contact are unanimous in their declaration that he was indeed one of nature's gentlemen. Thus within six months of the death of George Loan Tucker, he is joined in The Great Beyond by his co-director of the old London Film days.

* * *

Creator and Created.

THERE will be no peace in the realm of film until the very debateable (and much debated) question of the relative positions of author and director is settled. Recently we printed articles by Rafael Sabatini and Geoffrey Malins, each speaking from their respective positions; and yet the problem is as baffling as ever and requires some definite ruling. If only to crystallise the discussion that is still going on in cinematographic circles we venture to state that there are marked parallels between a photoplay, a stage play and a novel. The "common ground" of each of these is the fact that each is a created story—one is expressed by spoken word, one by written word and one pictorially. But in each there is the central fact that it is a created story. This being the case it is self-evident that to the created the creator is all-important.

* * *

Interpreting the Author.

SO that the logical conclusion is that the author—being the creator—is of primary importance; the artistes and the director being engaged in interpreting the ideas and thoughts of the author. This view is supported by Somerset Maugham, the well-known playwright, who says "I do not think there can be any real advance in the Kinema till the director resigns himself to the position honourably occupied by his confrere of the spoken drama and is ready to be the interpreter, and nothing more of the author." This not only appears to be a normal conclusion, but has the advantage of being the most practical and fair course to adopt. Only recently E. Phillips Oppenheim repudiated the F.-P. Lasky film version of his "Mystery Road," and refused to allow his name to be connected with it for the simple reason that it was not a true adaption of the book of which he was the author.

* * *

Render unto Caesar

AT the same time it must be readily understood that an author has the limitations of his own nature. In order to be a successful author a man must be somewhat of a dreamer, and the complaint of most directors with reference to the author is that this worthy has usually got his head well into the clouds. As a matter of actual fact the director must be allowed to know all the technicalities of cinematography and to control every aspect of the actual studio work, leaving the author to impart his ideas to the director out of the studio.

* * *

On the Move

THERE is a general feeling in the air that in a few years time commercial opposition in film production will not come so much from America as from the Continent. And there are certain obvious grounds for this assumption. It the first place it is fairly patent to every observer that America is becoming less and less the garden of hope for film manufacturers. As Wyndham Standing explained in a recent issue, the centre of gravity is shifting from Los Angeles. There are many reasons for this. One is that America has been shot to death. The American kinema-goers have become so familiar with the same white-pillared mansion, the same terraces, sea shores, mountains and deserts, that they are sickened of them. And if only to secure new settings, the camera must go elsewhere. Then the unsavoury cases that have become notorious have done much to damage Los as a city of movie-folk. Consequently there is a movement away from America.

* * *

From U.S. to Europe.

AND this movement is eastward. American producing concerns are staking, or are about to stake, their claims in Europe, with the result that, as we have predicted, producing activities are going to be very noticeable in this country (where, in a few weeks time, a new million-pound producing concern will be formed) and on the Continent. And it is safe to say that Germany will not be left out in the cold. As a matter of established fact, in spite of all the difficulties of rising costs of production and unstable rates of exchange, the German kinema industry is forging ahead in sensational fashion. Capital sunk in picture-producing concerns is constantly and enormously increasing in amount. The capital of the film-producing firms in Germany has increased by more than 300 per cent. in little more than a year. All the big concerns in the country are energetically cultivating the foreign market. For monster films subjects acceptable to foreign countries are chosen, such as, to mention only a few, "Lady Hamilton," "Hamlet," "Madame Dubarry."

* * *

Fruits of Victory.

BUT it is senseless to use these facts as arguments against Germany; they are arguments in favour of German perspicacity and business acumen. There is only one way to beat the German in commerce; it is the way we beat her on the field of battle—by superiority of merit. We must turn out better films, and to do this our British film producing business must be put on a sound and stable footing.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Last Monday Ellen Terry attained the age of 74, and on behalf of the profession I hasten to congratulate her. Her wonderful vitality and charm are undiminished as her recent engagements have shown. She has just completed the leading part in "Potter's Clay," which is one of the most important parts she has enacted on the screen. She is also appearing in a version of "The Bohemian Girl," the new Alliance film. On Wednesday last, on behalf of the actors and actresses of the English stage, she presented Princess Mary with a wedding gift, and no charity matinée or theatrical benefit of recent years has been without her gracious presence.

That irrepressible joker, Fred Wright, writes (it's catching, you see) to tell me that he has given up his car as he cannot get red oil for the rear lamp. He adds, "running over babies, too, has helped me come to this decision, as their feeding bottles cut my tyres so." Which explains why Fred always rides about in somebody else's car these days.

* * *

When kinema artistes have organised themselves into a protective Federation it will be hoped that they will tackle the question of obtaining stills. Most producing concerns charge their artistes for a still, and often, after the artiste has paid up, he finds that he has not received the still for which he asked.

* * *

At the Stoll Picture Theatre Club, J. Stuart Blackton cracked a good joke. He told us that cinematography is 6,000 years old and the first film star was Rameses II. This ancient king had a temple built and this was surrounded by pillars, each bearing an engraving of himself in varying poses, so that when his subjects rode quickly past these pillars the effect gained was a moving picture of their ruler. "And," said J.S.B., "the last picture of this first film star was of him with his hand open and his head turned—like many present-day film stars." Get the point?

* * *

The "Do you know" query of last week was founded on fact, for W. G. Faulkner now tells me that at the request of several artistes he has decided to establish an agency for artistes at his offices, 720, Oxford Street, under the direction of A. C. Fotheringham-Lysons, and under the style of a personal service department. As soon as Mr. Faulkner's intentions became known nineteen artistes registered their names. This new department will in no circumstances provide "crowds." Only those who have played parts in films are being registered. To comply with the law, Mr. Faulkner has applied to the L.C.C. for a licence. The personal service department is planned to develop in other directions, including a linking up with American and French organisations.

Miles Mander writes me from Tangiers, Morocco, to smash one of my illusions into umpteen smithereens. I always had an idea that Africa resembled Broadstairs sands on a summer day, but Miles Mander says that in a fortnight they have only been able to put in five days' work as it has been pouring in torrents. Added to this is the difficulty that Solar Films has with the natives as the Koran forbids (so M. M. says) Mohammedans to be photographed.

* * *

Incidentally, he also tells me that the party has been spending the evenings at the local casino with varying results. Adrian Brunel has lost steadily, Annette Benson has won over £120, and Miles Mander (who plays on a system!) wins about 100 francs a night. He adds: "We are the talk of the town." I should think so!

* * *

On Friday next F. P.-Lasky will Trade show "Three Live Ghosts," and I have just received Camera! (the American equivalent of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO), in which this British picture has been reviewed. This says:—"Containing much hilarious comedy, the necessary amount of reason and an almost entirely clever cast, this picture will not go wanting for popularity, but it cannot be said to reach the famous Fitzmaurice standard in all respects. Norman Kerry presents possibly the least interesting and colourful portrayal in the cast. There is nothing particularly wrong with the hero, but he just doesn't grip. Both Cyril Chadwick and Edmund Goulding, however, are gold-mines of mirth, while Clare Greet adds the finishing touch as the drunken spirit communing Mrs. Gubbins. Anna Q.

Nilsson enacts satisfactorily the feminine lead, while the list of players further includes John Milern, Annette Benson, Dorothy Fane and Wyndham Guise. From a production standpoint 'Three Live Ghosts' lacks a little of the richness that we have been educated to expect."

* * *

There is some prospect of Walney Island, Barrow-in-Furness, becoming an important film producing centre in the near future. There are miles of greensward along the shore and long stretches of sand, while the light is said to be favourable for photographic work. On the spot, too, is a huge airship shed, now empty, which report says will be turned into a studio. This is a mammoth shed where all sorts of scenery could be staged, covering a wide area. The shed is owned by Messrs. Vickers, and during the war it was a hive of industry when aircraft was under construction. I understand the firm has been asked for an option on the building. Barrow is hungering for new industries, and no doubt every encouragement will be given to the proposed enterprise.

* * *

This, my dear unsophisticated readers, is the way in which a certain publicity agent writes me with reference to a British artiste who is on his books: "I can see nothing in England to touch this girl. She is a mass of personality, intelligence and nous with the seductive attractiveness and mystery charm of a Gloria Swanson, Corinne Griffith and Agnes Ayres. She is the only leading English lady who knows what clothes to wear and how to wear them." My pious hope is that she gets an engagement.

* * *

Just to kill all the misleading news that is creeping into the ill-informed lay Press regarding the next Blackton production I will make the official announcement which Mr. Blackton himself has given me. This is to the effect that he has not yet decided whether it will be "Chu Chin Chow" or "Haddon Hall," but probably the latter. Nor will he have finally decided before April one way or the other, and when his decision is made it will be announced in the official organ of studioland.

THE PASSING OF BANNISTER MERWIN

The death of Bannister Merwin, the director and scenarist, came as a great blow to those who have been fortunate enough to work under him and to those who knew him personally.

Bannister Merwin was an American. In America he was for many years editor of Munsey's Magazine, and was a well-known short story writer.

The Edison Company persuaded him to write a number of original scripts for the films.

In 1912 he came to England, and in 1913 joined the London Film Co. as head of the scenario department.

For the London he wrote many original screen stories and directed a number of productions. Later, he spent some time with the Trans-Atlantic, and during the war did some propaganda work for the Government.

He was with Harma for a time, and then joined Broadwest. Later he took charge of Bramlin's scenario department and was connected with that firm for some time.

He directed productions for Master Films, including "Laddie" and "Love at the Wheel," the former was released a few weeks ago, and the latter has yet to be seen by the public.

He was always a great advocate for the original screen story and did a great deal to bring about the more liberal use of original scripts on the screen. He was a brother of Samuel Merwin, the American story writer.

His death took place on Wednesday, February 22, in his forty-eighth year, following an operation.

AN APPRECIATION by JOHN PAYNE

He had these outstanding gifts which cannot be gainsaid—a great brain, unselfishness and generosity.

As regards the former, that was a factor which stood out most prominently. His quick grasp of a situation, his summing up of character was in nearly all cases true and sure. Many times have I gone to him to disentangle a multitude of facts and circumstances, and after listening to me carefully, he would, after a few minutes, give a succinct and simple review of the situation.

I suppose psychology interested him more than anything—whether of a person or a fact.

Merwin was undoubtedly very unselfish. I remember the very first time I saw him. He was in the middle of a production—"Laddie" I think it was—and though I was talking to him about his own interests, I could not get him away from the subject of a friend of his who was then out of work. He would do far more for a friend than he would ever do for himself.

Indeed, his lack of self-advertisement was a fault with him rather than a virtue. Few who came in contact with him realised the amount of good work he has done for film production and the pioneer he was. It is a fact that his name as an author was the first to be ever featured at the commencement of a film. This was in the old single reel days before features were thought of. Again, he was the first man to invent and write a serial film—I am not sure of the name, but I believe it was "The Adventures of Mary," featuring Mary Fuller.

As for his generosity—well, he was like the proverbial Irishman—the less he had the more he gave away.

His end came suddenly and for that I have no doubt he is truly thankful. During our friendship we talked of many things—after-death being one of them. Whether his views were right or wrong, he knows now, and I hope he has found peace.

AN APPRECIATION by CYRIL PERCIVAL

News of the sudden death of Bannister Merwin came as a very great shock to most of us, and it seems impossible that his kindly jovial and clever personality has left us.

There must be very few in the film world who did not know B.M.—and all who knew him loved him. His quiet, unostentatious manner, genial disposition, and unfailing sense of humour endeared him to all.

He was perhaps better known as a scenarist and author than as a director. The writer first met him when he was scenario editor of the old London Film Co., for whom he also afterwards directed. As a director B.M. was always courteous, quiet and extremely patient. He knew what he wanted, and had a rare and happy way of making his artistes feel his ideas. The writer has the happiest recollections of playing in some of his productions. He dearly loved a friendly argument, which he always entered into with a quiet, humorous zeal that commanded both attention and interest.

His powers of repartee were well known, but one remark of his will live in the writer's memory for ever, and that was concerning a certain well-known author who is, at times, rather conscious of his own importance. It was at a certain function that shall be nameless where several well-known people were present. At the moment when the aforesaid all-important scribe entered, somebody remarked: "This is where we stand I think, gentlemen!"

Poor Merwin glanced up quickly and replied: "Not on your life, sir. I'm an Atheist."

ON OUR FRONT COVER

It is only in the fitness of things that the front cover of this journal should be again used by a new British producing company to introduce itself, as the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO stands for all that makes for progress in the profession.

R. N. Raleigh King is the proprietor of the concern, which has been formed to produce British films, and which is in full swing at the Watcombe Hall studios, Torquay, on its premiere.

Mr. King made his stage debut with Kenelm Foss some years ago. This was at the Little Theatre, in Chesterton's "Magic." Among his other stage successes are appearances at the Court and Apollo Theatres. Then he turned his attention to films, and has appeared in "The Message from Mars" and "Seas of Romance." He is now playing one of the leading parts in "Creation," the Raleigh King premier.

"Creation" is being directed by H. Humberstone Wright, and played by a cast wholly engaged at the Kinema Club. This includes Dorothy Fane, Sir Eimeon Stuart, Frank Dane, Kate Gurney and Thelma Murray.

On a recent visit to the studios at Watcombe Hall, our Torquay correspondent found the company busy at work on some elaborate interiors, and it is expected that "Creation," which is from the novel by May Edginton, will be the finest picture yet turned out from Watcombe Hall.

NATURAL—COLOUR FILMS

COLOURED cinematography has made its debut, and the Press and public have passed an opinion which, in the main, is not very encouraging to those responsible for its introduction. Some of us entertain grave doubts as to whether this is a "child of promise," for it certainly is "unseemly to look upon" in its present state.

So much has been said for it—and more against—that I almost fear to tread the contentious path of criticism, but as a mere artist, I may be allowed to do so, without fear of making or losing a reputation.

The colour pictures which I saw projected upon the screen, impressed me as being a twofold attempt to feast the eye and starve the mind: they failed in doing the first as effectively as they succeeded in accomplishing the second.

The pictures were devoid of atmosphere. In this word, so glibly used by those who so little comprehend its meaning, is spelt the "missing link" of colour cinematography. The word when applied to a picture is not descriptive of anything that lies within the colours on a canvas, and yet it is the first thing a critic looks for, and will overlook certain crudities if he discovers it.

It is a trinity of artistic expression, psychological expansion, and optical delusion. Upon a square of canvas an artist will distribute his colours, in an apparent confusion. Great blotches of yellow, brown and blue, chunks of red and orange, yet all the time mentally calculating the importance of what has to be left out, as much as what has to be put in. He is expressing something, which, to a close observer, is merely a mess, a riot of contrast; yet the artist knows that six yards away, the eye will see in this picture all the varied greens of an early spring, and in the eighteen feet between the eye of the observer and his collection of paint, lies that mystic thing called atmosphere.

Coloured cinematography can never give us this; the process of reproduction robs it of the possibility and because of this it is, I fear, doomed to failure.

Perhaps water-colour painting is more analogous to the subject under discussion. Good effects with this medium are not achieved by washing colour over colour, and to do this makes the picture dull and muddy, robbing it of the least semblance of "feeling."

No picture is likely to retain the interest of its viewer unless it allows ample scope for the imagination. The eyes must discover the blanks for the mind to fill in, and when you present a film which is leaden in its colouring, you banish that recreation of the imagination which the mind needs. An artist never paints trees green, and to think that blue superimposed upon yellow will bring to the mind's eye beauty of foliage and swar! is a regrettable mistake. The picture-house clientele does not deserve this reality. The eye wearies of piercing its gloom.

I am not sufficiently versed in camera-work to enter the arena of technicality, but I do feel that

The mechanical process of photography filters the colours of their light, which, after all, is their most valuable quality, and I doubt whether this difficulty can ever be overcome. Reproduction of pictures of any sort robs them of atmosphere, and when one considers the limitations of even our best lenses, combined with rapid exposures, and often insufficient light, and the process of backing and recovering the film in order to preserve it, one must indeed be an optimist of the first water who can entertain high hopes for coloured pictures.

David Robertson, the black - and - white and colour artist, writes on Colour Kinematography from an artist's point of view.

If the effects are so dull when only two or three colours are used what will be the result if four and five colours are superimposed? "The Glorious Adventure" showed us backgrounds against which it was almost impossible at times to discern the middle distant and foreground figures. J. Stuart Blackton told us, in his Stoll

A simple but effective illustration of the power of contrast and suggest on Picture Theatre Club lecture, that this effect was intentional, an admission which magnifies the fault.

In black and white films the camera captures that whiteness which eludes the colour productions and presents to us studies in contrast, which is essential to keeping the eye open and the mind awake. Black and white films allow the imagination to run riot amid the beauties of its brightness and half-tones. A field of waving corn bending gracefully to a stroking breeze need not be coloured yellow. That must be left to the imagination, so that the mind can clothe "my lady's garden" in all the wonders of Nature's tints, without the camouflage of the unnatural colours.

In "The Glorious Adventure," the colours recurred with such unvarying rapidity that the eye became drowsy, and the imagination billious, until the former closed in sympathy for the latter.

When I think of my two hours in the Opera House, my mind cries out for contrast, not colour. Colour does not make a film more instructive, educational, or realistic, but rather detracts from the first two and distorts the last.

If the future of colour cinematography is as bright as some optimistic directors assert, I suggest they evolve another picture, taken with their best cameras, and let us see if they really can capture a little of God's sunlight, which so effectively escaped them in their first effort. All honour to these pioneers of a new art, but we must be wary in accepting it as the Messiah of our hopes until we have a little more evidence of its promise.

J. S. BLACKTON replies:—

The editor of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO, in kindly asking me to reply to Mr. Robertson's article, provides me with a task by no means easy, for the statements by this artist on the colour work in "The Glorious Adventure" consist of such a considerable number of incorrect perceptions and judgments, that in replying I feel rather in the position of the donkey with a fly on its tail.

To begin with, Mr. Robertson is extraordinarily apart from facts when he declares that the Press and public have passed an opinion which, in the main, is not very encouraging. As a matter of fact, the percentage of favourable opinion is about 98 or even 99; and the critics who did not like the colour were so far in the minority as to be all but lost in the final returns. Views of lay theatregoers and of kinema exhibitors which we have received have been practically entirely in praise of the colour work in this film. And there is the outstanding fact that many painters, designers and artists of various types of international reputation have been enthusiastic over the results achieved by the Prizma process in this first application of colour to rapid action on the screen.

Before writing his article, Mr. Robertson should at least have secured himself on points of accuracy. I do not know what papers he has been reading, but we receive a very efficient Press cutting service, and the great quantity of comments received from all classes of publications have been entirely favourable, except in a comparatively few isolated cases.

Then, there is little to be gained from a hyper-critical attitude toward a pioneer experiment of this kind, which means so much in the progress of the cinematographic art. Constructive criticism is always helpful. Other kinds of criticism accomplish nothing, and can only do harm to the British film art and industry. Frankly, I have not a great deal of patience with those who expect perfection in a first effort.

Mr. Robertson, in declaring that "the pictures were devoid of atmosphere," goes counter to the many critics, including distinguished artists, who have commented in particular upon the picture compositions and the atmosphere achieved. At least, a half-dozen commentators referred to the pictures as like painted masterpieces come to life.

Then, again, Mr. Robertson writes of the film being "leaden in colouring," a statement that can be taken with so little seriousness that further comment is unnecessary.

Further, Mr. Robertson erroneously reports that it was at times impossible to discern figures against backgrounds, and also erroneously reports that I said, in my lecture at the Stoll Picture Theatre Club, (Continued on page 13.)

GOOD NEWS! STOLL

When the Stoll studio at Cricklewood bursts into renewed activity, as it will do in the course of a very few weeks, that vast building will become an absolute hive of productive industry for months to come.

Behind closed doors directors and the heads of the scenario and casting departments have been busy during the period of apparent stagnation converting stories into film scripts, casting leading rôles, and working out in every detail for a program of a round dozen of super pictures. Consequently when "hostilities" are resumed there will be absolutely continuous action.

Everything having been most carefully worked out, there will be none of those gaps between productions which are so usual in film studios; there will be no waste of time, on the floor, or on location, while the cost of a picture is calculated in the accountant's office, and the cast is selected by the director and the powers-that-be. The close (or should one say "closed"?) season has been utilised to the greatest possible advantage, and the making of pictures will go with a swing till winter comes again.

Maurice Elvey is now directing that delectable novel "Running Water," and Mr. Elvey is to direct two other Stoll pictures in succession, "The Country of the Blind," from H. G. Wells' extraordinarily powerful story, and "Open Country," from Maurice Hewlett's novel.

That excellent author, H. A. Vachell, figures on the Stoll list for the first time with "The Shadowy Third." Rita is represented by "Petticoat Loose," and Ethel M. Dell contributes two typical stories to the list in "A Debt of Honour," and "The Nonentity."

"Expiation" (E. Phillips Oppenheim), is to become a Stoll picture, and A. E. W. Mason contributes "Miranda of the Balcony."

A. E. Coleby who has won a premier position for himself as a director, is to direct three film-plays of his own invention which have not yet been titled.

HEPWORTH

To a gathering of pressmen on Wednesday, Cecil Hepworth, besides briefly reviewing his American tour, foreshadowed big developments at Walton-on-Thames. Adhering strictly to the standard of quality he has maintained for eighteen years, he aims at materially increasing his output, and he exhibited plans of the new studios which are projected. The old premises, which practically saw the birth of British cinematography, are still in use, although, of course, extended considerably, and naturally this has cramped the opportunities of directors. Under the new scheme a set of buildings, comprising six studios, are to be erected—a big two-storey building was shown in plan—with the top floor completely glazed, and a sloping approach from one side so that cars can be brought into the sets.

Mr. Hepworth's great aim is to secure privacy and independence for each director, and he instanced, as an example to be avoided, some of the big studios at Los Angeles, where the work of one director is seriously hampered by the activities of the scene-builders of a neighbouring set. Each studio floor is, therefore, to be kept as distinct as possible. Arising out of this disposition of space, came the interesting announcement that, in addition to Mr. Hepworth and Henry Edwards, there are four directors who have been in training for years. These men, whose personalities are at present "wropt in mistry," as far as the outside world is concerned, have, says C.M.H., arrived at the stage of independent production for the firm.

This scheme involves considerable capital expenditure, and there will shortly be offered to the public an opportunity to participate in a new £150,000 10 per cent. investment. The new company will make its announcement within a very few days.

GROUND PLANNING

One of the most interesting sections in L. C. MacBean's technical primer is that on Set-Planning in which the author says:

In drafting out the ground plan of a set, due regard should be paid to the "flats" and scene accessories in stock at the studio in order to avoid unnecessary expense in specially making them. The angular measurement of the camera lens likely to be used in taking the scene must also be taken into account. To assist in the latter respect, and to simplify and expedite the work of planning out a set, the author some years ago devised the "limit rule and scale" illustrated below. With its help, a workable ground plan, suitable for the guidance of a practical stage-carpenter, can be drafted out in a few minutes.

The rule consists essentially of a flat piece of wood or other substance in the form of an isosceles triangle, the vertex angle of which is equal to that of the camera lens to be used; the rule illustrated is suitable for the 2 in. lens in common use. The two long sides of the triangle then give the horizontal angular limits of the camera whilst, in the rule, the inner edge V and the outer edge c afford the vertical angular limits. On the side opposite the vertex angle is arranged a scale (most usefully $\frac{1}{4}$ in. to 1 ft.) and the markings on the sides adjacent to the angle indicate, to this scale, the distance (in feet) of any point from the camera, which, of course, is presumed to be stationed at the vertex a.

The object of arranging the vertical limit edges on the rule is to determine, when necessary, the point where the floor will be caught in the view, but more especially the height at which the view is cut off at any given distance from the camera—a matter of considerable importance when constructing ceilings, staircases, platforms, galleries, etc.

Also is shown the ground-plan of a set made with the help of this rule, including the horizontal and vertical limits. The dotted lines represent the camera limits at the full view (or long shot), the closer views naturally being subservient.

In large or important sets, structures of varying levels, similar to the former example, it is often advisable to project an end and side elevation in addition to the ground plan, and in so doing the vertical angle of the rule is also useful. If a ground plan only is handed to the carpenter for construction work, the distance at any point from the dotted line representing the top limit to that running midway between the horizontal limits, which now becomes the floor level line, gives the head-room or top cutting point (in accordance with the scale), whilst the point at which the bottom limit cuts the central line is that at which the floor becomes visible, important when arranging pits or trap-doors and in laying special flooring, carpets, etc.

The presumed elevation of the camera lens from the floor determines the scale distance between the vertices of the two drawn limit angles.

that this effect was intentional. I said nothing remotely like that* I should like also to oppose the argument of Mr. Robertson that colour does not make a film more instructive, educational or realistic, "but rather detracts from the first two and distorts the last." All this is specious reasoning. The human instinct craves colour, and to say that colour does not add to realism is to state an absurdity.

Why, for example, do advertisers more than double their expenditures to print their advertisements in colour? To capture the imagination of the reader and provoke desire, of course. Billboards and posters could be produced for less than half the cost in black and white. But would they serve the purpose of the coloured poster? Emphatically, no!

Colour is not to be considered merely as a pictorial asset. Its contribution to dramatic realism and to the psychology of drama in countless ways is a big subject upon which I cannot go into detail here. No one realises better than I the limitations of colour at the present stage of its cinematographic development, but the success of the first experiment has been far beyond my most earnest hopes, and that success has been acclaimed in England, America and on the Continent.

As a painter myself, I am entitled to claim a little knowledge on this subject. I am not familiar with the work of Mr. Robertson, but I am familiar with the internationally-known canvases of Edmund Dulac, Sir John Lavery, Augustus John and many other artists of note who have been pleased with this colour film. Not all of them have found the work beyond criticism; but they have considered the film deserving of much praise and a significant step forward in cinematographic art.

*EDITOR'S NOTE: The reply of Mr. Blackton to the criticism respecting backgrounds referred to by Mr. Robertson was, "These were dark for the reason that other backgrounds were light—because they had been deliberately chosen so."

The top drawing shows the limit rule and scale in use in drafting ground plans of settings. The larger drawing is a ground plan sketch made by aid of limit rule, the dotted lines indicating the view limits of the camera.

SCREEN VALUES

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"Dicky Monteith."

Thompson—Starring Joan Morgan and Stewart Rome—Supports: Jack Minster, Gertrude Sterroll, David Halkett—Directed by Kenelm Foss—Adapted by Kenelm Foss.

OWING to obvious faults traceable to the directorial end of the production, this is one of the disappointments of the British producing business.

It is no concern of a journal of this description to judge a film from the point of view of its appeal to the public or of the director's conceptions of what the public wants; but we may be permitted to regret that Tom Gallon's excellent character study should have been allowed to become, when transferred to the screen, crude melodrama.

Kenelm Foss is responsible for adapting the story to the screen, for casting the picture and for directing the production. In each of these three departments we are inclined to be adversely critical. There is a lamentable impoverishment of story value that does not reveal itself in the original novel, and the only conclusion is that this value has been lost in process of transfer.

There are instances of errors in casting: Joan Morgan is cast to play a dual rôle—that of the heroine and that of the slavey—and the artiste who plays the Mayor's nephew is absolutely and obviously unsuited to such a part.

Convincing realism is lost (particularly in the latter part of the film), owing to imperfect direction, until one is left wondering whether Kenelm Foss is better as director or as adaptor.

The outstanding histrionic success is Stewart Rome, as Joan Morgan is somewhat spoiled by being heavily handicapped with the impossible task of playing such an incongruous dual rôle. However, as a slavey, she is quite good.

In the supporting cast the artistes do the best they can in the circumstances, but, as we have already said, David Halkett is badly cast as the Mayor's nephew, in which unsuitable part he does his best.

The member of the technical staff who scores at all is the cameraman. His photography is quite above the general level of the production.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Defective.

LEADS: Both good.

SUPPORTS: Fair.

LITERARY: A poor adaptation of a good novel.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Quite good.

EXTERIORS: Variable in suitability.

INTERIORS: Variable in quality.

"A Will and a Way."

Artistic—Starring Ernest Hendrie—Supports: Charles Ashton, Johnny Butt, Pollie Emery and Cynthia Murtagh—Directed by Manning Haynes—Scenario by Lydia Hayward—Photographed by Frank Grainger.

IT is no exaggeration to say—and no odious comparison is intended—that "A Will and a Way" and its companion production are the best contributions that this country has made to the world's stock of screen comedy.

These two films are true comedy—not slapstick on the one hand and not high-brow stuff on the other. They reflect life as it really is, but with a humorous accent. They are worthy of the original author—W. W. Jacobs.

To the director and the scenarist high praise is due. They have evidently worked hand in hand, and the result is that none of the delicate humour of W. W. Jacobs is lost in transferring the book to the screen.

Continuity is perfect, sub-titles very apt, and the cast has been handled with great skill.

* * *

Let it be distinctly understood that with Ernest Hendrie on the market this country cannot reproach itself for absence of screen comedians. Hendrie is the pivot of the cast. He is not only the type (thanks to his facial expressions), but is also an artiste.

The rest of the cast come right up to the high standard set by the lead. Pollie Emery never falters in her portrayal of the widow.

Playing opposite Hendrie is Cynthia Murtagh, as the daughter. She has a very pleasing screen personality, and her artistry is unquestioned.

Charles Ashton, as the lover, submits a polished performance, in which intelligence and natural comedy blend perfectly.

Johnny Butt rounds off the cast with a natural gaiety that augments the comedy quality of the human material engaged. His work is on a par with that of all the rest.

In view of the fact that most of the picture was shot in the winter, Frank Grainger's success is all the more noteworthy. Good straight photography and of excellent quality throughout.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Very skilful.

LEAD: Wonderful work.

SUPPORTS: Excellent throughout.

LITERARY: Good book made into perfect scenario.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Adequate.

EXTERIORS: Well chosen.

INTERIORS: Appropriate.

"Sam's Boy."

Artistic—Starring Johnny Butt—Supports: Tom Coventry and Bobbie Rudd—Directed by Manning Haynes—Scenario by Lydia Hayward—Photographed by Frank Grainger

PATHOS and humour blend in a perfect and artistic whole in this second of the W. W. Jacobs' films. The British producing industry has gained considerably by the addition of these two comedies to the list of productions.

Again, this is an instance of the wisdom of the policy of the director and scenarist working in sympathy. Both have done their work well; the former in casting and maintaining the Jacobs' atmosphere, and the scenarist in submitting a perfectly balanced screen story.

Johnny Butt is a born comedian. As the skipper, he imparts real-life fun into the film.

Nor can Tom Coventry fail as a fun-maker of the screen. His character study of the seaman is perfect.

Bobbie Rudd is a discovery—he is a child artiste of the unprecocious type, and should go far in film work.

* * *

Again, Frank Grainger scores with his camera work. This includes some excellent London dock scenes.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Very skilful.

LEAD: Good.

SUPPORTS: Good.

LITERARY: Story good—scenario well balanced.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Good.

EXTERIORS: Unconventional and convincing.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

It is desirous of obtaining from members an expression of their wishes in the matter of entertainments. The Entertainment Committee has been working hard and achieving great success in the various functions it has organised, but now it feels that it would help matters considerably if members would come forward with suggestions. To this end I invite all members to write to me at this office (or c/o the Club) or to the Secretary of the Committee, voicing their opinions as to the nature of entertainments which they prefer.

The most successful dance since the opening was held last Saturday, and there were more members present than on any other occasion since then. The dresses were very pretty and effective—these dances seem to be the most popular event, and the committee has decided to hold them every Saturday until further notice.

On Sunday a whist drive was held, which was also popular, Eva Llewelyn winning first prize and Mr. Keenan second prize. The arrangements were very ably carried out by Ruhama Catton and Harry J. Worth.

On Tuesday—the wedding night—a “Jolly Evening,” as it was announced, was held. And it lived up to its name. Jollity and fun reigned supreme, and all present voted it a huge success and wished a princess would get married every week.

Already names are being handed in to the Secretary for the Kinema Club Production. Those who are prepared to play any part—other engagements, etc., permitting—should communicate with the Secretary. Several scenarios have been submitted, and these are being carefully considered by Duncan McRae and Fred Paul.

All connected with the Club were deeply grieved at the sad news of the death of Bannister Merwin. Mr. Merwin was one of the earliest enthusiasts who supported the Club when it was only a vague nebulous idea. At that first meeting in this office of about 50 invited people to discuss the idea he was voted a member of the Formation Committee. Brigadier-General Hulke, the manager, attended the funeral as representing the Club, and laid a wreath “from fellow-members of the Kinema Club” on the coffin.

DIRECTING OR PRODUCING.

May I be permitted to “second” the remarks of Harding Steerman, in your last issue, on the abuse of the word “director.” Whatever may be its suitability, in America, as a term to designate a person who produces a film, it is, in the English language, an absolute misnomer.

Years ago, before entering the film business, I frequently controlled the original “staging” of pantomimes, plays, etc., and I was known as a “producer.” Everybody engaged in similar work has always been designated by this term, and it was naturally adopted by makers of films as a suitable name.

A director, as a descriptive name applied to an individual, can only, in the English language, be accepted as one who sits on the board of a limited company.

There was a young fellow named Jay
Who left his car stuck in the way
But in spite of excuses
The Bench so obtuse is
That five bob he's just had to pay

It is only necessary to consult your own advertising columns to see that, in the American sense, it is far from being accepted here. Out of eight advertisers under the classification of directors seven are unable to get away from the word “produce” or one of its inflexions. Instead of using the term “Latest productions,” why do not these advertisers use “Latest directions”?

However, if for no other reason, let us, for the sake of independence of thought and action keep to our “produce,” “producing,” “produced,” “producer,” “production.”—WALTER REYNOLDS (Jnr.).

FLAT CATCHERS

I read with interest your paragraph headed “Removing the Wool” in a recent issue, and am very glad to learn of your intention of investigating the bona fides of existing schools.

It is about time this evil was stamped out once for all in the interests of the profession at large. The notoriety of the majority of these schools is practically world-wide, and I cannot understand that persons can still be found who are willing to pay large fees to these establishments in the futile hope of obtaining employment “on the films.” I am not referring to schools of good repute, several of which I know do exist.

And why did the newspapers describe the male prisoner in the London Cinema Academy case as a film director? He was no more a film director than my local dustman, and is never likely to be.

I have long noticed the tendency of people in the police courts, charged with various offences, to describe themselves as film artistes, and the daily papers seem only too glad to give publicity to it, such as: “Film artiste charged with theft,” etc., etc.

Film artistes, as a whole, are a long-suffering body, but there is a good time coming, when they will win the recognition they deserve.

Wishing you every success in your investigations.—MILTON G. ELMORE.

THE ACTOR PROBLEM

I read with great interest your admirable “Getting the Focus” paragraphs in your last issue. What you say is perfectly true. As an illustration, in 1914 I came to London, was seen by a gentleman who took me to a certain film office in Wardour Street, to play the part of the late Van Dyne in the “Broken Melody.”

I have long white hair, and was often taken for V.B., and used to play the violin-cello, and also played “The Broken Melody” on it. I was turned down. Why? Because I was not a West End actor. The part was played by a West End actor nearly a year after, and it was scrapped. The same thing goes on to-day. A film actor is born not made.—“WATER FINDS ITS OWN LEVEL.”

“THE FASCINATION OF FILMS”

Comparison between the stage and screen is, as Mrs. Malaprop would remark, “odorous,” but does Teddie Gerard not appreciate in successful film work—

(1) The joy of seeing oneself doing excellent work?

(2) The opportunity of correcting any little mannerisms, etc., that a theatre audience might be too polite to criticise?

(3) That there is a sense of being almost immortalised in pictures, while one’s “parts” on the stage seem transient?

I think, too that there is an excellent feeling of good comradeship in all the worries and delays of a film production; and, taken altogether, the film world comprises a very jolly crowd.—FREDA KAYE.

CASTING “HAMLET”

You know just recently that there has been a lot of talk about kinema acting being the refuge of the actor and actress who have tailed on the legitimate stage. That is hardly the case. Most of us who are screen-acting have been on the regular stage all our lives, and still love it. But the theatre is in such a tottering state there is not a living to be gained at stage-acting; at least not for the ordinary rank and file.

Apologies, and arising out of all this, a discussion was started the other day in a certain studio, and the play of “Hamlet” was cast from the old London Film Company:—Hamlet, Henry Ainley; The King, Fred Groves or Lewis Gilbert; Laertes, Gerald Ames; The Ghost, Chas. Rock; Horatio, Phil Heward; Polonius, Windham Guise; First Player, Hubert Willis or Geo. Bellamy; Osric, Hayford Hobbs; First Gravedigger, Douglas Munro; Second Gravedigger, Frank Stanmore; Ophelia, Elizabeth Risdon; The Queen, Gwynne Herbert; Player Queen, Christine Rayner. Directed by Kenelm Foss.

Gerald Ames, who is an international swordsman, could arrange the fencing.—DOUGLAS MUNRO.

Record of Activities of Kine-Cameramen

"OF HIS DEAD SELF"

IN a despondent mood the average cameraman will grumble at the few prospects he has in view. Is he doomed to crank the handle for the rest of his days? Is it possible to advance? Can a cameraman go a step further and become a more important personage? Surely most cameramen have in view the next step upwards. What will they do when they forsake the camera, forget about the dark rooms and take on a more remunerative position? In other words how can a cameraman be promoted? Can he rise on stepping stones of his dead self to higher things?

In the past it has been the custom of the cameraman who is on the look out for promotion to become a director. Quite a number of present-day directors were once cameramen. If a director has graduated from the camera, he will nearly always be found to turn out a better class of work than the man who does not understand the working of the intricate little box. The reason for the former's success is that the photography is of a fine quality, and the reason for this is that the director treats the cameraman in the way he should be treated, while the other director expects his cameraman to be able to take impossible shots, with dire results to the quality of the photography turned out.

A director with a good knowledge of composition, photographic effects and the other camera matters which every kine photographer must know, is obviously a far superior director to the old-fashioned "producer" who knows only which side of a megaphone to shout through.

IMPROVED LIGHTING

by BERT FORD

The interior lighting system in British studios is one of the cameraman's greatest obstacles, and until this obstacle is removed there is little hope for our cameramen to compete with the cameramen of other countries.

I have never had at my disposal when working more than about 230 to 250 volt circuit, so that if I must use two spots, each taking 70 to 100 amps., it leaves very little for general illumination.

The system on which I work is by general illumination with enclosed arcs, these lamps taking only 15 amps., and have a longer throw of actinic light than a multiple lamp of four sets of carbons on the same circuit and taking 25 amps. The latter is blinding to the eyes.

The lamps I place in such a manner as not to cast hard shadows on the scene, with Cooper-Hewitts, say, one or two banks, to soften down any shadows, for shadows on the faces are at times so dark that one cannot discern the features. On the other hand, if there are no contrasts of light and shade to give roundness to the figures and relief to the features the whole scene would be a general mix up of shadows.

There should be plenty of reflected and diffused light, and the light should be applied properly.

I would like to mention that in my opinion there is not sufficient attention paid to spot lighting in the studios to enable the cameraman to obtain perfect back-lighting or the most desirable and so-called stereoscopic effect. Well known and tested spots are necessary in all studios, whether used on every set or not.

My experience is that the majority of spot lamps used in our studios are practically valueless in actinic ray.

Back lighting can be done with an ordinary lamp for a close-up, but one misses all that artistic brilliant lighting when we go back to the long or quarter shot again.

To improve our lighting, a plant that will give sufficient current is required, for as things stand if we had the good lights over here it would be doubtful if we could get enough current to get them going. It is little use trying to make any article perfect without the proper tools. Without voltage we cannot have amperes, and without amperes we cannot expect really brilliant pictures.

Bert Ford with his two Kine Cameras

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

Phil Ross informs me that he has not fixed up with Riviera Films as was announced here last week. So far nothing definite has been decided by either Ross or the Riviera company.

The wedding of Princess Mary and Viscount Lascelles came as a boon and a blessing to crowds of cameramen. Nearly every cameraman in London was working with one or other of the topical companies. All along the route were the more or less cheerful faces of kine. photographers, most of whom were Kine. Cameramen Society members.

The arrangements for the filming of the wedding last Tuesday were very elaborate. The film of the procession was showing at the London kinemas on Tuesday afternoon. On Tuesday night five hundred guests of Lord Harewood assembled in Leeds to view the Pathé film of the event. There were over sixty cameramen employed by the various topical firms, and there were many novel shots of the procession. Special men were engaged to rush the negative through the crowds to the printers, and within an hour after the procession the films were ready for distribution. A number of cameramen were absent from the K.C.S. meeting on Wednesday as a result of the strenuous time they spent the previous day.

But the wedding is only a taste of what is coming. The topical side of the business is livening up. The next big event in the topical world is the Grand National, for which many extra cameramen will be engaged. If they have as enjoyable a time as the men who were out on the same job last year, there will be little to grumble at.

The producing side is looking more cheerful also. Whether any of the super-companies that are forming will come to anything remains to be seen, but at least they should provide work for a few cameramen for a few weeks—a questionable kind of blessing!

Why is it that, with all these companies in existence, there are still cameramen out of jobs? The reason is that many of the men who are turning for these companies are not cameramen. Never before have there been so many "unknowns" turning camera cranks. There seems to be an influx of would-be cameramen to the producing world. Evidence of this can be obtained by visiting a few of the book-stalls and finding how readily "The Beginners' Guide to Kinema Photography," "How to Take Moving Pictures" and such books are selling up. Meanwhile, the real cameramen have got to stand by and wait until the firms find out that a knowledge of the workings of a camera does not make a cameraman.

Basil Emmott has already started work on "Byron." So far, however, he has been engaged upon taking film tests of the various characters in the film.

WHAT WOULD YOU DO?

"There is no such thing as death ; when the body dies the soul will find another vehicle and return to earth."

That is what Zena Hammond believes, and strong in this belief she confidently awaits the return of her dead husband.

This striking story entitled "CREATION," by MAY EDGINTON, is in the process of being filmed now by the RALEIGH KING PRODUCTIONS.

DOROTHY FANE plays Zena Hammond, the wife whose faith is stronger than death itself.

How many women would act as she acted ?

Do not miss this splendid film which will be Trade Shown in JUNE, 1922.

Turning the Corner.

AT the commencement of the year we stated in these columns that 1922 was pregnant with potent possibilities. The year is young yet, and already there are unmistakable signs that the Industry is turning the corner and is about to start on that year of prosperity that we predicted. And to a greater extent than perhaps is generally recognised the touchstone is £ s. d. In this fight for film supremacy the British Industry depends considerably on the sinews of war. And studying, as we have to, the fluctuations of the Stock Exchange, it is our pleasure to report that an upward movement in share values has set in in favour of British films. This week Cecil M. Hepworth has issued his prospectus, which is one of the soundest propositions that the capitalists of the country have ever had before them. And we desire to point out that the measure of success that attends this flotation can be regarded as an index to the attitude of financiers generally to the British film Industry, in view of the fact that the Hepworth goodwill is so high and the proposition so sound.

* * *

Tom Tiddling.

BUT apart from the financial aspect there are other concerns that should be given intelligent attention by all interested in the Industry. This year is a critical one. New forces, new ideas and new personalities are making their presence felt, and the net result will be, we are convinced, a great progressive movement. Ten years ago the film Industry reached a pivotal point: an occurrence that has its identical counterpart to-day. In 1911, film entertainment was in danger of losing its grip on the popular fancy. To-day the same possibility is existent. What we, in 1922, have to fight against is not so much the after-effects of war as the after-effects of 1911-1914. During that period the film Industry became a regular Tom Tiddler's ground and there was a rush as in the days of the gold-fields of Klondike. Fantastic salaries and monstrous profits were common-places. But the change set in three years ago, and since that time the Industry has been like a South American town in the earthquake zone. Matters have now settled down somewhat so that it is possible to overhaul the past, discover the damage done, observe the causes of the damage and set into operation remedial measures.

Good and Dud.

AND there is one very obvious source of danger: the Public and its Demands. This is vital because fundamental. Much to the surprise of the average film manufacturer and director it has been discovered that the Public has a chronic attack of Fed-Upness. Photo-plays are much of a muchness. When one has been seen, ninety per cent. has been seen. The Public's demand is for change and novelty. It has developed a critical and an exacting taste in film entertainment and the cause of its increasing lack of interest in the kinema is that the film (like the music-hall) is below its standard of good entertainment. And the sooner

THERE is nothing quite so easy as passing on blame. When duty is performed defectively; when the results of labour are faulty; when work is unsatisfactory the natural tendency is to blame it on to the next man. From the moment that Eve ate the apple and blamed it on to the serpent there has always been a pre-disposition to shelter behind someone else. When a production gets slated artistes blame the director; the director blames the cameraman and the firm blames everybody. The time has come for everybody to realise that there is no excuse for poor-quality work. From everybody is demanded the best. The best is not the maximum standard but the minimum—there must be no Less-than-the-Best. Neither is neglect of duty on the part of the next man any excuse for neglect of duty on your part.

the profession realises this fact the sooner will the door to success be thrown open. It is a fatally shortsighted policy to turn out junk because it is cheap to turn out. In effect it is terribly expensive. The price of junk is the future of the Industry. It may be that some of our readers have thought our "Screen Values" feature rather harsh and stern. All we have aimed at is to be kind by being scrupulously fair and just; to be unnecessarily favourable to a British film is to damage the whole of the British Industry. If producing concerns are allowed to roam in a Fool's Paradise and imagine that their dud films are good films the result will be that the Public will be so fed up with dud films that it will refuse to go to the kinema even when good films are on show.

Up to Standard.

THUS the Industry stands at the turning-point, and the whole future is dependent upon the vision that the leaders of the Industry possess and the skill with which they can "sense" the desires of the Public and provide film entertainment up to the standard—not that is set by the director or the artiste, but—that is set by the Public. And for the benefit of the captains of the Industry we might add that the Public's conception of good film entertainment is streets ahead of what the industry conceives to be such. The Public has a critical faculty. It has also a well-developed intellect. "Tuppenny gaffs" and the blood-and-sawdust "meller-dramas" belong to the days of barbarism. The variety theatres are closing down simply because they have dragged along far behind the Public on the question of the quality of music-hall entertainment; the kinemas will close down for a similar reason. The Industry will turn the corner and ascend the hill of success if it decides to elevate its standard of quality. And it must do it now.

* * *

"Britain's Best."

FOLLOWING on this subject it will not be inappropriate to refer to the projected Kinema Club Production. The idea is to make a picture out of the brains of the best artistes, best directors, best cameramen, and best scenarists we have in this country, and who are, of course, members of the Club. That the Club is the child of our bosom does not prevent the parent chiding it if occasion arise or of guiding its youthful footsteps over the rough places of the industry of which the parent knows so much. To this end we warn the Committee that unless the Kinema Club production is the best British picture made it must be scrapped. This production will go out to the trade, go out to the public, and go out to the world as the work of the best brains in the British Industry. And if it falls short of the highest standard it will do infinite damage not merely to the Club but to the British film Industry itself. America would say: "We told you so—the British cannot make pictures. This is the work of their best people and look at it!" It is to be hoped very sincerely that the Committee are alive to the wide issue involved.

AN ARTIST AMONG ARTISTES

In this short article David Robertson, the black-and-white artiste describes his impressions of a visit to the Kinema Club—and illustrates them. It is hoped that no member can recognise himself.

"I'M a very, very disappointed man," I also disillusioned, and at the doors of 9, Great Newport Street, lies the cause of my undoing.

Until making acquaintance with that institution I was wont to wend my way regularly to the local kinema to have my emotions ravaged, and wrought upon.

But now—the disillusionment! It has robbed the show of its joy, for at the club one finds all the members of the fraternary so much like other people. They walk, talk, eat, play, smoke, and drink just like ordinary human beings. There is no atmosphere of romance. You miss those wonderful exchanges of grimaces on the screen, passion looking out of eyes things which if they came out of mouths the speakers would be arrested; the tenderness of the woman's upward glance, the wild clutchings of the recipient of bad news, and all those other expressions of unrestrained emotions.

Kinematically speaking, one would expect to see Victor Yougo lurch, semi-stagger and stagger when informed that all the barley wine is sold out, as that Maynard Sweets would strike a melo-dramatic pose when about to offer a cigarette to that multitude who enjoy the O.P. brand thus.

This is the only logical attitude that I, in my unsophisticated mental condition, could conceive possible in one with the high reputation for histrionic capabilities that Maynard Sweets has—especially among my flapper acquaintances.

Then one would expect to see Gland Birkenfoot creeping into the gentlemen's lounge, in order to destroy the copy of the Daily Herald which some unassociate member, surreptitiously deposited there disguised as an Advocate.

Then where is the rage of Cancuss Swear, who has paid in a life membership fee, and now learns from his doctor that he cannot live more than three weeks?

And where is Mr. Hep Worthwhile, who has returned from a trip to Bomcutta and Calmaca and Los Angelois? (special emphasis on the first letter).

I should expect him to enter the club after wasting a lot of good British words, in saying what could have been said of the things he has seen (this word being interpreted meaning rotten) in this fashion:

But then, as I say, they do not do these things, they are so human. Looking at their photos in the Artistes' Cards Section of this paper. Why they do not put more ginger into them, I don't know. Why should not the villain get one taken like this:—

Surely villains look thusly. And if so, why not say so? I admit that only once did I see a real hall-marked villain while I was at the Club and therefore my personal knowledge of villains is not unduly extensive. But I assure you that this particular villain looked exactly like the picture a few lines above. His eyes glared; his hands were open ready to clutch; his neck lengthened—and he made for the bar!

There are all sorts of suggestions that come to my mind similar to this. I am, of course, an "e"-less artist and do not know much about that kind of "drawing" that belongs to the science of advertising. But I certainly do think that there is a marked absence of novelty, or ingenuity, or initiative shown in the advertisement columns of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO. Every one seems so inhumanly human, I can discern no difference between the hero that I saw on the screen last night and—my tailor (except that my tailor doesn't have to wait so long). Why doesn't he—the hero—look heroic? And why doesn't the ingenue look ingenuous?

And if the comedian happens to be real funny man say so in this way.

And just before my election to the Committee, Ladies and Gentlemen, allow me to suggest something like this behind the bar—

What a queue (pronounced kik) in the aforementioned gentleman's lounge! And I feel that something ought to be placed in the ladies' lounge to make it more attractive. Just what it could be escapes me, but I am sure the Editor would give a substantial prize to the best suggestion sent right in. Efforts must not exceed one thousand words, and whatever the winner's winnings must be donated to the society for the recusitastion of female medical students.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—Already I have received 9,731 letters from lady members in reply to the query, "What should be put in the ladies' lounge to make it more popular," and they all say—"A Man."

Intimate Studio Gossip

Reverting to the news of the Hepworth expansion announced in our last issue, I might point out that the issue of the prospectus, whilst revealing the exceptionally sound position that Hepworth is in, gave one furiously to think of the dark days of 1917. During that year the net profits were as low as £17. It speaks very high for Cecil M. Hepworth and his sterling business qualities to say that he changed that £17 in 1917 to £7,339 the next year, and to £13,921 in 1921. And now, with the introduction of this new capital appealed for, there is every reason to believe for a record year at Walton.

* * *

Teddie Gerard, who is now appearing in "A to Z," is still airing her views on film work, after having drawn a good salary for working in an American studio. She attempts another outburst in the Press (this time in the Era), and says: "Filming is a sheer waste of time, though it is arduous and requires considerable patience." Well, now that she is doing big business in "A to Z," let us hope that she will not be guilty of another "sheer waste of time." There are plenty of stony-broke kinema artistes who do not mind wasting their time in that manner.

* * *

Miles Mander sends me a cheery card from Tangier: "We have at last got some scorching weather and are finishing here and crossing to Granada next Thursday for a week, and then we finish." He says that the native Arab actors in the film are striking, but does not make clear whether this is intended as a compliment to their personal appearance, their screen work, or the work of their labour leaders.

* * *

Most of the critics of the kinema who object to the filming of well-known novels—which has become quite a habit with British producing firms—imagine that novels are filmed partly because the name of a well-known author on the posters is an almost certain draw, and mainly because it is so easy to pick up a book and, "We'll make a picture of this!" Guy Newall, whose George Clarke Productions have all been adapted from well-known novels, assures me that such is not so in his own case. "My only reason for filming novels," he says, "is that it is practically impossible to find original stories of exceptional quality. I hold no brief for the novel as the basis of a screen play, and since I believe in stars I do not pin my faith to the market value of authors' names. If I could find an original story, specially contrived for the screen, which was really original and which provided Ivy Duke and myself with really suitable rôles, I would gladly direct it in preference to any ready-made work of fiction, no matter how great the demand for that ready-made work of fiction might be with the lending libraries. The star system is a perfectly good system, to my mind, and preferable to what might be termed the "novel" system, as long as art is put before stardom and above all things before pecuniary considerations."

* * *

A few days ago I was one of a little group present at an "At Home" of Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Tozer at their new home in Ridgmount Gardens. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. E. Nepean, the latter the authoress of "Gweneth of the Welsh Hills," in the film of which J. R. Tozer played a leading part; Mr. and Mrs. Wentworth James, the latter the well-known novelist; Douglas Haydon, who sang some delightful songs; Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Hurst, and many others well known in film circles.

* * *

W. G. Faulkner asks me to state that he has never had any connection with any kinema training school, nor has ever been connected directly or indirectly with anyone who has established or carried on any such school. He regrets that some confusion has arisen in this matter, hence his desire to make the facts known. His application for a London County Council licence to establish a personal service department for principal kinema artistes was due in the first instance to the request of a number of well-known artistes, and he has made a rigid rule that no pupils of kinema schools can be registered for engagements through his personal service department.

* * *

Here is a tribute from an exhibitor to British films. W. L. Phillips, of the Oxford Hall, Keighley (where the Ideal Company was recently at work) writes:—"Much controversy is rife in the newspapers and in our own Trade papers as to the merit of the British productions when compared with those of foreign countries, and especially America, but I can say without fear of contradiction that the British productions we have exhibited at this hall stand far ahead of any American productions—taken class for class—in acting, scenery, setting, photography and general production."

* * *

Have just received a long chatty letter from Amy Verity, who is now playing lead in "Pins and Needles" on Broadway. She tells me that she will be glad to get back home, and expects to return during the summer.

* * *

I take this opportunity of urging all casual readers to become regular subscribers to the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO. So many people write to tell me that they have great difficulty in obtaining the paper from the book-stalls that I must again point out that our policy is to keep it out of the hands of the general public and to keep it exclusive to the profession. For five shillings a copy of the only journal devoted to the interests of those engaged in British productions will be posted direct from this office for thirteen weeks, arriving on your breakfast table every Saturday morning. It is on sale at the Club every Friday evening.

* * *

Last week I wrote to Arthur Rooke inviting him to give his views in these columns on the best form of studio lighting. He replies: "In my opinion there is only one perfect form of lighting, and that is God's own sunlight." If this were only always possible, what an El Dorado this country would be.

* * *

It is to be hoped that the Mutual Film Company will be as successful as it hopes to be. It has already created something of a record; two weeks ago it was formed, and in this short space of time it has raised capital, cast and shot the film, and has given a private show of the completed film. The company is being run on a co-operative basis: director and cast draw no salaries, but have invested money in the project, and their return will be proportionate shares in the receipts.

CONTRASTS—WHAT IS SEEN ON THE SCREEN AND WHAT HAPPENS IN THE STUDIO

by MAJOR H. HODGSON-BENTLEY

HAVE you pondered, gentle film fan,
As you take your red plush seat,
Of the folks who manufacture thrillers for you?
Of the settings and the lights,
And the artistes—hapless wives,
And the organising—(pray don't let me bore you).

FIRST you go to shoot interiors,
And you make your face up ghastly
With a stick of white and then a little Five-O;
Then your lips they quickly grow
To a lovely Cupid's Bow,
Put some black upon your eyes and on your eyebrow.

NOW you're ready on the floor,
And you're feeling full of pep,
All the lights are turned on full and there you're toasted.
You save her when she's drowning
(And all the time you're browning),
And you finish feeling that you're joints are roasted.

YOU wed before you meet her,
And you have to fight McLaglen,
Who's a Bullfinch for a scrap in any case.

There's a lovely set behind you,
And the Sun arc tries to blind you
As you go and find a beefsteak for your face!

YOU swim through raging rivers—
(coming from the water main)—
And from the villain's clutches snatch the girl.
Get Director's condemnation,
"Not sufficient animation"
And you go home with your headpiece in a whirl.

NO more Studio to-morrow
You're going on location,
You're sure the car ride and the place are nice.
When you get there it is freezing,
And you start a fit of sneezing,
And you're feet and hands are like a block of ice.

HOW one longs then for the Studio,
With its warm and cosy Cafe,
With its smell of film cement, and light and bustle.
But what one loves the best,
When the paint is off—you're dressed,
And the Bank notes from the cashier's office rustle!

FILMS IN CANADA

by H. DAVIDSON (Montreal)

As one who is keenly interested in the kinema, I desire to discuss the question of the making of films in Canada, and at the same time give a few hints as to why British films are not more popular in this part of the Empire—Canada.

Canada's climate in summer or winter is just as good as the States, and her scenery is simply wonderful. Proof of this is shown when such eminent directors as Marshall Neilan came here just about a year ago and directed "The River's End" in the coldest time of the year.

What you Britishers ought to do now is to send us out a few more top-notchers like "Alf's Button," which was simply great, and some more pictures like "The Great Gay Road," "His Dearest Possession," and "The City of Beautiful Nonsense."

I clearly recall the case of one picture which was shown here about three years ago, just about seven months after Canada was clamouring for British pictures. This picture was shown at one of the leading Montreal theatres, and a representative of a leading New York Trade paper was in town. He casually asked me if I would mind coming along to this particular theatre to see the picture. As I knew the picture was British I was quite willing to go, but the picture was simply terrible—never in my life have I seen a picture drag along as that did—though in justice to the artistes they were all fine—it was primarily the cutting-room and director's fault.

All you need to do to impress us is just to send us really splendid productions.

And all I ask is just this: Advertise your pictures! Hepworth's "His Dearest Possession," one of the finest British pictures I have seen, was only shown in two theatres in Montreal, which has over 105 picture-houses, and it was the same all over Canada. What we want is for you to let us know what you have.

RECIPE FOR COMEDY

Now that British producing concerns are turning their attention to comedies, it is interesting to read what A. C. Christie, the well-known American comedy director, says:—

"I want to preach the doctrine of do rather than listing a lot of disagreeable don'ts," said Christie in discussing the difficulty of evolving humorous situations for the camera to record. "Don't rules are generally made to be broken, and I hate rules around our studio, anyway. I would rather set up a standard of things to try to do. Here is this standard for the two-reel comedies:

"1.—Get a plausible story which might happen to real people. It may be worked out farcically or in regular dramatic and logical sequence. But it must be entertaining.

"2.—All the actors must look like human beings whom one might meet in every-day life.

"3.—Take your time. It is not how many pictures you make but how good they are that counts. This advice is particularly for directors.

"4.—If you are torn between sticking to the story or going afield for a laugh, stick to the story. If the story is amusing, the chuckles will take care of themselves.

"5.—Make the backgrounds as beautiful as you can. Few people will notice the expensive rug on the floor, but they will notice it if the floor were bare.

"6.—Try to take your part without trying to be funny.

"7.—Try to seem to enjoy your work. If you don't enjoy it, find other work.

"8.—Make your pictures for your family. The majority of the people who see them in theatres are just about like your own wife and kiddies."

'AN ARTISTE ON AGENTS

by GEO. HODGES

It has been very interesting to read the many little articles on the subject of an artiste's worst enemy, but I was certainly surprised to observe that an agent should presume to rush into print to lecture artistes in general. Of far more interest to us is the question of the average agent's treatment of those who provide the wherewithal for agents to live.

There are agents and agents. Who gave some of them the authority to call themselves agents? Who they were before they set themselves up as agents Heaven alone knows.

Many agents are good fellows, always ready to help artistes, and even known to help in more ways than one. These men are known to all of us, and to the directors, too, and they don't have to advertise either.

The other class of agent looks upon the artiste as just a poor worm, and artistes have to put up with it because any kind of work is so scarce at present.

I called upon an agent this week and knocked at the door two or three times, but I received no reply. This agent was in because I could hear him talking and laughing with a couple of girls.

I have heard it alleged that another so-called agent, one of the advertising type, tries to charge artistes 5s. for registration, though I believe he has sense enough not to try it on any of the old hands.

It is weary work trudging round from agent to agent looking for work, and agents can't give work when they haven't got it to give; but when they begin to lecture artistes on how to behave its about time they studied the subject of behaviour themselves.

"IN THE SPRING——"

WITH the coming of spring the film director polishes up his megaphone, gets out the script upon which he has been going to start for the last six months, and prepares to make his annual spring production, which, as usual, will stagger the world.

The producing companies automatically close down when autumn arrives; they anticipate the rains, cloudy skies, short sunless days, and last but by no means least, that terrible ogre which, after all, is the chief cause of their fears—Fog! But surely the days on which we have fog are not frequent enough to justify studios closing right down.

When all is said and done, the whole matter can be traced back to the cameraman. It is because the companies believe it is impossible for a cameraman to photograph on almost any day in winter, that they temporarily retire from the business.

That it is possible to get good results during winter is demonstrated in two new Artistic Films. These pictures were taken during the winter and the quality of the photography is considered excellent. Then there is another example. On the topical side of the profession, weather conditions are only secondary to news value. Topical men cannot wait until tomorrow because it is foggy to-day. They must film under all kinds of climatical conditions, and it must be admitted that they get excellent results.

Then, of course, the whole matter when boiled down is this. The studio men are not given a chance. They are told that they cannot film during the English winter, and, whether they can or cannot, they are given notice to quit.

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

LAST week's attendance was somewhat small, but most people expected that, and it was a wonder that any meeting was held at all. The Secretary was away in the Scilly Isles, the President was in bed sleeping soundly, having worked all the previous day and night on the film of the Wedding. And most of the members had been busy filming the Wedding, and were somewhat exhausted after the strenuous work of the previous day. It is, therefore, rather surprising that any meeting was held, and we can quite understand that it was practically impossible to negotiate any business under such conditions.

Very little business was done. Correspondence was read, but no discussion arose out of it. The meeting was therefore closed at an early hour, and the usual after-the-meeting discussions on technical subjects occupied the minds of the members present.

These little informal discussions after the meeting seem to be a great attraction to many members. They are usually interesting and enlightening, and serve a very useful purpose in educating the cameramen up to a high standard of efficiency. Many members declare, that for this alone, they do not begrudge the money that goes to pay their subscriptions.

With the advent of the summer months, it will no doubt be found necessary—as has previously been the case—to stop the meetings for a few months. But this year will be different from the other years, when the cameramen never met each other during the summer months when the meetings had been discontinued. By means of the Kinema Club they will now be able to keep in touch with each other, as many of the K.C.S. members are K.C. members as well.

STUDIO-CAMERAMEN

IN my opinion, in a vast number of instances the relations between the cameramen and his director are by no means as intimate as they should be—to the great detriment of the resulting productions.

The cameraman should have a copy of the script a week or so in advance, and not merely for perusal as is so often the case, but to be retained for reference throughout the production. The director should collaborate with him regarding the setting of scenes and placing of artistes, so that the cameraman's knowledge of lighting, depth of focus, etc., etc., in relation to the usually limited lighting facilities, may be fully utilised.

Having the script to refer to, and given that he is in close touch with the director's aims, the cameraman should have an entirely free hand in lighting, vignetting, soft focus effects and kindred matters, and in deciding whether conditions are suitable for shooting. He should, of course, be in a position to dictate his requirements to the laboratory side, and be consulted upon the final printing, dyeing and toning. He should assist in the cutting and assembling.

The resultant photography should not be merely perhaps good photography, and an accurate record of action, but should materially assist in the actual telling of the story, by harmonising with the particular scene and action therein. I do not consider there is any definite limit to the cameraman's duties—circumstances dictate so largely in that direction.

To sum up, I venture to suggest that the ideal is attained not only by each being fully capable, but perhaps rather by each having complete confidence in the capabilities of the other, and at the same time willing to consider, and appreciative of, any helpful suggestions from the other.—PHIL ROSS.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

KENNETH GORDON has just returned from a week's trip in the Scilly Isles, where he has been filming for Pathé. During the week he has travelled over one thousand miles by train, air lifeboat, steamship, donkey-cart, sailing-ship and on foot. He has secured a number of interesting scenes in and around the islands, which will be included in the Pictorial and Eve's Review.

I. ROSEMAN is filming the new B. and C. historical subjects, and has just completed work on the first one, which is founded on the life of Mary, Queen of Scots. He will film these subjects at the rate of one a fortnight, and before he is through will turn on the French Revolution, Egyptian history, Henry VIII.'s wives and Charles I. and II.

BERT FORD'S reference to back and spot lighting, in last week's issue, has commenced an old argument among cameramen. Is back lighting necessary? Strictly speaking, it is not necessary. But it greatly enhances a picture from a photographic point of view, providing, of course, it is judiciously used. Many cameramen are opposed to it, many are favourably inclined to it. It gives a stereoscopic and beautiful effect to a picture when properly used, but it is usually an unnatural light, and because of this many will have little to do with it. Picturegoers are really the judges, however. It rests with them to decide. Do they prefer a beautiful back-lighted stereoscopic effect, or do they prefer a hard, flat picture, which throws shadows in a natural manner??

THEN the other argument arises—do picturegoers take sufficient notice of photography to decide whether they like back lighting in preference to an ordinary straightforward picture? If they do not take sufficient interest in the photography, then they will not notice that some back-lighting effects are unnatural, and that shadows are being cast in the wrong direction. They are bound to find the spot and back-lighting effects more pleasing to the eye. It is an interesting point, and one which can be argued on for hours. The same applies to many of the photographic effects in use to-day. Does the picturegoer appreciate them?

AN interesting feature in the new Mae Murray film, "Peacock Alley," is the sub-titling, which is photographed in Prizma Colour. The sub-titles greatly add to the value of the picture, which is only an instance of the comparatively virgin work in this direction. English companies are beginning to improve their sub-titles, but many are as yet far from perfect. A well-photographed picture loses a great deal of its beauty if the sub-titles are badly photographed. It is inconsistent to have a well-photographed scene, then a badly photographed sub-title. It is annoying and irritating to the average person.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

During the next few weeks the Sports Committee will be very busy arranging summer sports. These will include tennis, cricket, golf and swimming. Will members who are desirous of joining the Sports Club for any form of sport hand in their names to the office.

Good news for the ladies! At its last meeting the Executive Committee decided that the billiard rooms should be thrown open for general use—ladies as well as gentlemen. It is now to be hoped that the ladies will take full advantage of this concession.

Will all members desirous of taking any part in the Kinema Club Production hand their names into the office. When the production actually commences, work on it will be so arranged that this will not clash with other engagements of those taking part.

SPECIAL NOTICE: To-morrow, Sunday, a very novel evening is to be spent. This is an old-time concert. It will be run on exactly the same lines on which the popular concerts of fifty years ago were run. There will be an old-time Chairman (when his disguise is penetrated it will be found to hide the rotundity of Sydney Paxton), and there will be some special star turns, including the inimitable Arthur Roberts. Every member should make a great effort to be present on Sunday, at 8.30 p.m.

To-night, Saturday, there will be the weekly dance. Members may bring guests. A new band will be in attendance.

A special committee, under Billie Bristow, is hard at work on the details for a monster Kinema Artistes' Ball, which is being organised for April 25 in a big West End hall. All the news about this will be issued later. Meanwhile, book the date.

WAIT AND SEE

There have been a few folk in the profession who have been Jonahlike enough to refrain from giving support to the Club until they were convinced that it was a success. And these folk have waited so long that they are now paying the price of their hesitancy. Their plight moves Cyril Percival to break out into rhyme.

I.

IF we had only known, of course
We would have joined before,
We never thought 'twould come to aught,
So now we feel quite sore.
We've been inside and had a look
At members in this cosy nook,
And now we want to "sign the book,"
To bring in pals galore.

II.

WE never thought near Leicester Square
The premises would be;
From entrance door to billiard floor,
It's wonderful to see
What has been done by just a few
In something like a month or two,
With little "gas" and lots of "do."
It suits us to a "T."

III.

IF we had only known the sub.
From three to five would climb,
We should have paid, and spared ourselves
The moral of this rhyme.
We wish we could join now for three,
But Allighan says smilingly:
"It's like your cab outside, you see!
You pay for 'Waiting time'!"

SCREEN VALUES

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"The Little Mother"

Ideal—Starring Florence Turner, John Stuart and Lilian Douglas—Supports: Charles Thursby, Harvey Braban, Richard Atwood, Evan Thomas, Hal F. Martin, H. Meymott, David Miller—Directed by A. V. Bramble—Scenario by Audrey Oliver—Photography by Horace Wheedon.

"THE Little Mother" is a disappointing picture from many points of view. In the first place it is a very bad attempt to copy the sentimental-mother dramas which have lately been arriving from America, and the director has spared no pains to ladle out the sentiment in such liberal quantities that the picture almost becomes a burlesque.

The sub-titles are foolish because of their excess of sentimentality. Many are quite unnecessary; the only possible reason for their inclusion is that they help along the sentimental element which envelopes the picture in an atmosphere of tears and gloom.

The situations are not very well explained, and there is evidence of the cutter's scissors left in many of the incidents

The acting is not of a very high standard. John Stuart is good, but he has little chance with the poor material at his disposal.

Florence Turner has done better work. She is given very little opportunity, and although she plays the title-role, her appearances in the production are few.

Lilian Douglas looks pretty, but in the more dramatic scenes does not acquit herself well.

Harvey Braban and David Miller both give good performances.

Evan Thomas gives a remarkably fine exhibition of restrained acting.

Hal Martin has a very small part, but he does it well, as does also H. Meymott.

Either the director or the scenarist has introduced too many sub-titles. The continuity is a little uneven.

Photography, by H. Wheedon, is quite good, but contains no startling new shots.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Adequate.

LEADS: Good.

SUPPORTS: Good.

LITERARY: The scenarist has made the best of the bad material at her disposal.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Adequate.

EXTERIORS: Good.

INTERIORS: Good.

"Potter's Clay"

Big Four—Starring Ellen Terry, Dick Webb, Peggie Hathaway—Supports: Douglas Payne, Wallace Bosco, Edgar Wallace, Henry Doughty, Edward Thurlby, Fred Raines—Scenario by Langford Reed and Hetty Spiers—Photography by Robert Dykes, F.R.P.S.

EXCEPTIONALLY interesting are the scenes in the Pottery and the views of the town of Oxford and the rural districts of the South. But a photoplay must be more than a scenic; it must possess swift-moving drama, good characterisation and well-edited continuity. And in some of these respects "Potter's Clay" fails.

It is no easy task for this journal, which exists to support the British film producing industry, to tell the painful truth about the premiere of a new company, but it is only fair to those financially interested, as well as the industry as a whole, to do so.

* * *

It is obvious that the firm has been severely handicapped by an unfortunate experience with directors. A change in directors in course of production may account for much that is faulty directorially. As matters now stand, the film needs speeding-up by drastic cutting. The scenes in the home of the musician should be cut right out; the scene of the development of the photographic plates and the whole of the last thousand feet should share a similar fate; the picture should end when the villain is unmasked and the hero announces that Hypatia is his wife. Then the director has made other scenes badly ill-balanced. There is no strength in the scene of the quarrel between the hero and his mother, and yet much footage and emotion is wasted over the reconciliation.

The introduction of the German officer is farcical and equally unnecessary.

* * *

The greatest tragedy of the picture is poor Ellen Terry. Badly directed as she is, she excites the sympathy of every observer; her position as a screen actress in this picture is woebegone, and it is to be deplored that such a great actress should be shown in such a bad light. Miss Terry's failure is obviously due to faulty direction.

The outstanding success is Dick Webb. He surprised us by the flawless perfection of his performance, and in the scene where he recognised the rescued girl as his sweetheart he achieved a great histrionic success. Mr. Webb should become one of the leading British male artistes.

Peggy Hathaway took advantage of every possible opportunity, and revealed herself as an actress of considerable worth. But again, there is every reason to attribute her one faulty scene to over-direction. This is where she is offered a job by the villain of the piece.

Wallace Bosco and Henry Doughty are both good—the latter being especially noteworthy as the musician.

Douglas Payne has had to struggle with severe handicaps in putting over his part owing to the fact that he has had to endeavour to repair the faults of the direction.

* * *

Some of the scenes have been well photographed, but, on the whole, the photography is not up to the best British standard.

Very little credit rests on those responsible for the story, which is a hotch-potch of melodrama, light comedy, and best American Kinematographese.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Very poor.

LEADS: Dick Webb excellent.

SUPPORTS: Good, except where badly directed.

LITERARY: Story crude, scenario fair.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Fairly good.

EXTERIORS: Very good.

INTERIORS: Well Staged.

We Told You So!

BEFORE we go any further this week allow us the privilege of the above ejaculation. Our preachment of the gospel of optimism has been sneered at by the sceptics, but now those who came to scoff will remain to "prey." Already there are most unmistakable movements for good, and the latest and best is the news that Goldwyn (one of the three largest producing companies in America) is sending a special producing organisation to this country for the purpose of starting production here next month. Our American correspondent states that the first picture will be Hall Caine's "Christian," and this will be directed by Maurice Tourneur, the famous American director. For some time past we have known that this was in the air, and our advice has been repeatedly asked on the question of securing British casts and British locations. We can now announce that Goldwyn will bring over its own stars, but will require second leads, small parts and crowds, and that the chief scenes will be shot on Epsom Downs during Derby Day and in the chief thoroughfares of London. After Goldwyn, be prepared to hear of a new British company with a million pounds capital.

Bad Publicity.

IT has been truly said that publicity is the breath of life to the film world, but it can also be the cause of death. One of the errors of the past that the American trade has to fight against is the over-selling of its films to the public. In that Land of Ad-venture films have been over-advertised, until the public has begun to regard advertising matter in exactly the same light as St. Peter regarded the utterances of Ananias. And we in this country can learn lessons from the errors as well as the accomplishments of the Americans. The public must not be misled, either knowingly or unwittingly, by publicity. A recent instance of faulty publicity methods suggests that not every publicity "expert" is an expert in the science of publicity. When "Beauty and the Beast" was first screened at the Alhambra a month ago the publicity "expert" made Guy Newall declare that he had made this short film in two days during the preceding week. We have only just seen this film, and in so doing have recognised it as one which was made at the old London Film Studios over three years ago. This is publicity of a very bad type.

Art or Artfulness?

IT is fitting that we should point out that the most neglected art in British film circles is that of publicity. The most generally accepted view of film publicity is that it is artfulness rather than art. But that is not the case. Cecil Hepworth has come back from the States convinced of the intrinsic value of this form of art. It is hopeless to expect success to attend anything, the success of which is dependent upon the public, unless the interest of the public is intrigued and the public attracted to the goods offered. This is true about artistes, directors and all engaged in the production of British films. The day is very near when directors themselves will suddenly wake to discover that their marketable value in the film world is much lower than it need be because they have failed to keep their names and their personalities before the public. For, with the quickening of an intelligent public is coming a discrimination in the work of directors: the public will soon have its favourite directors, just as it has its favourite stars, and will follow them. Artistes, too, are not, at present, keeping themselves before their public enough. They must realise that when a picture is cast the producing concern does this with both eyes riveted on the drawing power of the picture, and if a player's name is a good "box-office attraction," that player will find himself in great demand, and it is the law of supply and demand which determines values.

Rash Charges.

NO doubt it is only natural to expect that as a result of the one or two instances of immorality in the Californian studios, there should be an outcry in this country against film artistes in general; but we do not think that Elinor Glyn, several of whose books have been screened, has helped matters by suggesting that in order to raise the moral standards in kinema circles the public should only patronise those artistes known to be living irreproachable lives. To speak thusly is to infer that there is a goodly proportion of film artistes living lives which are not irreproachable. We were delighted to hear J. Stuart Blackton at the Stoll Picture Theatre Club take Lady Astor severely to task. He told the audience that during the past week two prominent members of the Church—clergymen—had been tried for moral wrongdoing, but no-one stigmatised all clergymen as immoral or vicious. And all thinking people will desire to be identified with Mr. Blackton's protest. We know infinitely more about the private and professional lives of most British artistes than Lady Astor, and we assert that there is no class of the community so free from glaring immorality. If a census of the dopers and debauchees of London were taken it would be found that film artistes were at the bottom of the list, while many typical Society people would be on the black list.

A Glutted Market.

IN this issue is commenced a series of articles dealing with the evil of the average Kinema School, and in the course of these articles we venture to think that our readers will be surprised at the nature of the revelations. But what should be perfectly understood is the fact that no one has any moral right to allow the simple-minded to think that there is room in the film-acting profession for aspirants or "gifted amateurs." There is not. Everyone must be fully aware that the profession is hopelessly overcrowded. The melancholy procession that flows up the stairs of every agent's office in town is pathetic in the extreme.

GESTURE AND THE KINEMA

Below will be found an interesting article by Colonel Netherville Barron, C.M.G., M.V.O., explaining in outline his theory of setting gesture to notation and the application of this theory to music.

I am glad to avail myself of this opportunity afforded me by the Editor of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO to make a brief statement on the subject of my research into the laws of gesture, because I believe that this research will prove of use to the British Film Industry. All that I shall attempt here is briefly to state the salient features of my work and its bearing on the kinema.

As a physician I had long been interested in the connection between emotion and gesture, and during a long period of close study I became more and more convinced that every emotion found its inevitable expression in some particular gesture; that is to say, the artiste in expressing anger might attempt it in various ways, but there was only one perfect expression, and any marked variant from that, whether of hand, or foot, or eye, meant that the expression was to some extent imperfect.

The next thing was to analyse what one meant by emotion. The primary instincts, with their accompanying emotion, can be thus stated:—

INSTINCT.	EMOTION.
Sex.	Sex.
Parental.	Tenderness.
Gregarious.	Sympathy.
Pugnacity.	Anger.
Rivalry.	Emulation.
Curiosity.	Wonder.
Flight.	Fear.
Repulsion.	Disgust.
Self-nourishment.	Hunger, thirst.
Acquisition.	Acquisitive.
Construction.	Constructive.
Positive.	Display.
Negative.	Modesty.

For each of these primary emotions I worked out by careful observation the most perfect gesture expression.

Simple or primary emotion is of relatively rare occurrence. The commoner forms are secondary, or even tertiary; that is, they are made up of more than one constituent. In endeavouring to express these more complicated emotions I found that a proper blending of the two or more primary gestures produced a most perfect expression of the more elaborate emotions.

As examples of secondary emotions I would quote anxiety, which is a combination of tenderness, positive-negative, wonder, anger, fear (with pain). Loathing is similarly a mixture of fear and disgust.

Again, awe is a mixture of wonder, negative, fear, while gratitude is a mixture of tenderness and negative. Combining awe and gratitude we get reverence, and the perfect expression of reverence is found in the combined gestures of all five primary constituents.

During the war I had a splendid opportunity of demonstrating the correctness of my theory on thousands of patients who passed through my hands, but I was then gradually coming to the conclusion that apart altogether from its psycho-therapeutic possibilities (in the treatment of neurosis), this theory opened up great possibilities to the actor and producer.

In an experimental way I applied it to film work, and my experiments were, I think I can claim, a great success. So much so that I hope to use my methods very shortly in the production of British films of an entirely new type.

For the purpose of producing a complete film, play or opera, a notation of movement had to be invented. A sample of this notation applied to a piece of music is given herewith. Perhaps a word of explanation would be advantageous here. The first notes are simply the description and character of the actress to whom they refer. The "T" shows that her disposition is tender; her age is seventy, and the hieroglyphic denotes female sex. The circle with the tail, above the notation, denotes that she is sitting. The three lines of the notation indicate the rate at which the gestures are made—the bottom line legato, the middle line moderato, and the top presto. The numerals denote the range of movement. Thus, F2 means two degrees of fear. (WF) placed in a bracket means a secondary emotion, namely, doubt, of limited range. H stands for habit. ● means repeat, and () means hold on to the finished position.

I do not anticipate that hide-bound kinema directors will take easily to my production method. In the first place such a system demands that director and artiste should know the method thoroughly before they begin to work on the film. This, although perhaps "a consummation devoutly to be wished," is not easily accomplished.

I claim, however, that a greater degree of efficiency can be obtained by such a method than by any hitherto elaborated. The artiste has nothing to fear for his art, because, when all is said, this is but the scientific basis of technique. But although this system does not make acting genius-proof, it should certainly make a production fool-proof, and it will not, as some of my critics have suggested (before they have made any investigation), make for the mechanisation of acting.

A complete understanding of the science of gesture should be the beginning of the actor's, and particularly the film actor's, craft, and such a system as I have developed, combined with the notation, will give director and artiste a good skeleton on which to build up part and production respectively.

After all, it is only at the beginning that any difficulty is experienced, for with the application of this method the parts are obvious, for the director can give each actor his notation, and by combining these notations into a score, can produce his play in much the same way as a conductor manipulates his orchestra. Perfect synchronisation and intertwining of parts can be assured, and the trying-out process, with its waste of time, temper and good celluloid, can be reduced to a minimum.

The problem of combining music with the film is also overcome, as I hope very shortly to demonstrate to the British and Continental public.

A sweet old lady, somewhat crippled, is seated in a chair, thinking tenderly of her sailor son. As she hears the moaning of the wind she rises from her chair and walks slowly to a table near by, on which is a photograph. Despite her belief in the protecting angels, she is for a moment doubting and afraid. But immediately she reaches out her arms in a gesture of love and resignation and trembling slightly she grasps the photograph and sinks slowly to her knees to murmur a little prayer for the safety of her boy.

Intimate Studio Gossip

During the week I ran down to Elstree to see the Big Business on foot there. I found that Denison Clift has been busy on interiors for "Diana of the Crossways," and next week the big scenes between Fay Compton and Henry Victor will be taken—the biggest chance it is said that any two artistes have had for many a day.

Another incursion from outside the film profession has taken place at Elstree, where another picture has just been cast. I understand that A. V. Bramble is to direct Arnold Bennett's "The Card," and Laddie Cliff comes from the Palace to play the title rôle, while Frank Goddard, the boxer, has been provided with an important part. What a lure studio work is!

While on the way to the Manchester Kinema Carnival on Wednesday evening last, the car driven by Bert Wynne collided with a taxi with disastrous results, fortunately only to the cars, both being smashed. Bert Wynne, who was accompanied by William Shaw and Robert Higgins, all of whom were considerably bruised and shaken, were able to proceed to the carnival.

After completing work on "A Romance of Old Baghdad," Kenelm Foss left for the Continent last week and is combining business with pleasure. He is making a search of certain parts of the country for locations suitable for scenes in "The Beloved Vagabond," in which Maurice Moscovitch will play the title rôle. Foss expects to spend several more weeks out of England, and on his return will immediately start work on the first of his three 1922 productions.

A gentleman—and a fighter—has taken up the challenge issued by Fred Wright some weeks ago to meet him (Fred) or his deputy, if he could claim to have worn a white waistcoat with a dinner jacket before he (Fred) introduced the fashion on the stage. As his deputy for the fight Wright has nominated Victor McLaglen, which arrangement appears to be perfectly satisfactory to the gentleman who has answered the sartorial challenge. Fred, it is hoped, will act as referee on the occasion of the meeting, and the match will be arranged for the earliest possible date after McLaglen has finished work on his present film. Meanwhile, if there are any other comers, Fred Wright will be glad to hear of them, "For," says Fred, "Victor may as well have a go at them all at once—it'll save time."

Donald Crisp made personal appearances at the Futurist and Ardwick Theatres, Manchester, last week. The theatres screened a film of his arrival in Manchester. Unaccustomed as Donald Crisp is to public speaking, he made a most delightful speech. He has a clear musical voice, a good stage presence, and while he is witty and gets many a laugh, he talks a lot of sound sense. He told the people of Manchester that the film people of Filmdom—despite all that the newspapers write to the contrary—were working people like themselves; hard working people who for the most part lead quite respectable lives and should not all be condemned because of the one or two black sheep in the fold.

He then went on to say that although England is his home and a wonderful country and that he is happy to be living and working here again, America owed its success as a nation to the fact that it was peopled by workers. He had just returned from Berlin where everyone was working, and therefore although technically Germany was beaten in the war it looked like a prosperous successful country.

I suppose we all ought to be highly flattered, but my native perversity is no doubt responsible for the fact that I am merely amused, that an elaborate film section has just been commenced in Town Topics. Andrew Soutar has been commissioned to conduct this, and he publishes letters that he has received from various people in the profession laudatory of the idea. So I suppose it is quite all right.

This week I saw the first of the new Solar films. This was "Burma," with which country it dealt in a highly interesting and entertaining manner. The second is to be "Morocco," which Adrian Brunel has just finished. Brunel arrived in London this week, and we shall all be delighted to renew acquaintance with him, Miles Mander, Annetie Benson and Crispin Hay (his party) at the Club.

I was at Davidson's last Monday and saw Arthur Rooke at work on "A Bachelor's Baby." This picture is nearly completed, but will not be Trade shown until June. One of the features of the Davidson Studio at the present moment are the fine selections being given by Malcolm Tod between the shots on his "Swanee" whistle.

The news that the studios at Worton Hall are again busy will be pleasing to most people, for this time, according to one of the British Super's chief officials, the studio is out for real business. Albert Ward has already started work on the first production, which is a sporting picture. Lilian Hall Davies and Clive Brook are in the cast, and Sydney Blythe is cameraman.

STAR DUST FALLING

Story More Important Than Stars

IN view of our recent article on the question of the star system, it is interesting to note that Thomas H. Ince, the well-known American director, has just finished the compilation of a questionnaire to the editors of newspapers and magazines in every part of the world, including this country, in an effort to determine the public attitude toward pictures.

One of the most important facts established is the descent of the "star system." To the question, "Does the public want productions featuring star players or productions featuring the story?" 790 answers were received. The result is a preference for story over star by a margin of 368 to 252.

Of the total number of answers 170 were either non-committal or gave answers that were not in reply to the query.

More than fifty per cent. of those who favoured the star system declared that the story was fast gaining in popularity, that the star was not the sole attraction, but a suitable and interesting story was also essential to perfect motion picture entertainment.

The consensus of opinion on the part of those who expressed a preference for stars was not that the public went to the theatre because of a particular desire to see the star, but because the announcement of a certain player ensured, in almost every case, a well-acted and altogether enjoyable entertainment.

They also emphasised the importance of the star in the public mind because of the fact that certain stars usually appear in certain types of pictures, and for that reason the public knows what to accept in the production.

Many of those who answered in favour of the star qualified their statement with the word "unfortunately," and added that the story was rapidly commanding greater attention. The majority of those listed among the non-committal answers gave as their comment the fact that both the star and the story were essential, but these answers were not counted because the question sought to differentiate clearly between star and story.

All of which goes to show that, with the publics of the world, the story is of chief moment. Absence of story can never be atoned for by the name of a big star.

THE remarks by Guy Newall in the "Megaphone" feature last week raises a question of vital importance to the future of British production—viz., the original scenario.

The day has fortunately passed when "Adapted from Pemberton's famous novel" was the first essential of a booking proposition. A director can rarely take shelter behind the reputation of a best-seller nowadays, and, although there is a slight danger at the moment of the return of "stunts," story and production value seem to be taking the position they should always have occupied.

It is almost pathetic to hear the never-ending cry of the producing concerns, "Where can we find subjects"; even the book agents are in despair.

Why, then, are original scenarios not forthcoming? The reason is that the payment is not sufficient to induce either writers of reputation or newcomers of intelligence and education to study screen art.

It is now over six years since I won the Evening News £100 prize for an original scenario. At that time I was considered lucky in securing such a large sum for "merely a scenario." When I told my friends that the day would come when any scenario which was worth producing would be cheap at £1,000, they looked upon me as a dangerous lunatic.

Three hundred pounds is the highest price I have received for an original scenario (I have never heard of anyone in England getting as much as that), and I regret to say that I cannot afford to write at that price while I can find any other way of earning a living.

Let us work it out in figures.

If we take away the playwright's or novelist's literary power of making old things seem new (and the screen almost invariably does that), it is safe to say that the life outfit of no author living or dead has exceeded twenty original stories. Also, no author (worthy of that honoured name) has ever written more than two stories or plays in one year.

Here, then, is the scenarist's prospect:—
Two scenarios a year at £300 = £600.

Life output: 20 scenarios = Ten years' work. And then—?

Is it to be wondered at that the hundreds of scenarios which arrive yearly at every director's door all bear unmistakable evidence of being written by shop girls and office boys who have parted with a precious two guineas to a training-by-correspondence school?

Attempts are made from time to time to unearth new stories by prize competitions. The problem cannot be solved that way. No established author, or ambitious youth about to select a career, is likely to give the necessary study to our new art on the off chance of winning a prize.

If our industry is to be saved from the tedious repetition of stories that do not matter, there must be the most drastic revision of ideas on the value of the original scenario. It must be made known, accepted as a fact, that both fame and fortune are as possible to the writer for the screen as they are in all other branches of literature.

PROPAGANDA PRODUCTIONS

by P. E. Smith

NEARLY every time I look out of my window, which commands a view of five different roadways, I see little groups of working men standing about. By their movements it is easy to see that their conversations are decidedly heated; and the subject which engrosses them is obvious: "Down with Capitalism! Let the world be governed by LABOUR!"

You may wonder why, in a journal devoted to the film industry, I am allowed to broach a political problem. But one moment! Has it never struck you that there is probably no other industry or profession harder hit by the after effects of the war than the kinema?

The men who compose these little groups in the street already referred to, are victims of unemployment. Rightly and wrongly they resent their humiliating positions; and in their suffering and ignorance, they are laying the blame upon the long-suffering capitalist. Now, here is a chance for those of wide vision, who fully realise the power of the silent drama.

I suggest to you that film manufacturers should set themselves to work upon a series of small dramas, capable of portraying in an appealing, human fashion, the crass folly of the existing strife between Labour and Capitalism. Propaganda of this description, well made, rightly and extensively handled, would be of paramount importance to the welfare of the nation.

Rightly used, the kinema is the greatest known force for influencing, enlightening and refining the minds of the working man and his family. And if, instead of being falsely represented in the guise of an enemy, the capitalist, through the medium of the screen, was shown in his true colours as the friend and benefactor of the working classes, I venture to predict that the working man—the backbone of Great Britain—would straightaway rise to the occasion, and give thanks to those patriotic persons who opened his eyes to the true aspects of the situation.

This type of films would undoubtedly prove a change, and be certain of interest to most people, without interfering with the exhibitor's usual program. The desired effects could quite easily be compressed into a series of one or two-reel dramas. They need not cost much to produce or rent. The propaganda films during the war succeeded. Would it not be possible to produce others on this subject with equal success?

Of course we should be told the same old story. The exhibitor would not pay the price or co-operate with producer or renter. But I am not so sure. However black some people may paint exhibitors, there are always the good with the bad—those who see beyond the mere booking costs of films. This suggestion, if properly exploited, might have greater possibilities than first of all supposed. And it could certainly succeed if there were co-operation all round.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—While not committing this journal either to support or disagree with Mr. Smith's opinion, we think it would be interesting to hear what our readers think on this matter.

IN THE FLESH

ONE of the best forms of personal publicity is for film artistes to make personal appearances at public functions. There is no surer way of getting into the heart of the public than by allowing it to think that it is on nodding terms with its screen acquaintances.

By reason of the unique organisation that our associate journal, the Kinematograph Weekly, has in connection with both the renting and exhibitorial ends of the business we are able to announce that a Special Department has been formed at this office for introducing artistes to exhibitors, concert and ball organisers for public appearances.

Will all artistes who are willing to make public appearances communicate with the Manager, Artistes' Publicity Dept., MOTION PICTURE STUDIO, 93, Long Acre, W.C.2?

Richard Garrick is in London, prior to starting work on a new production, "Paula of the Hills," which will be made in France.

Madge Tree has been engaged by Gaumont to appear as Claremont in the new production "Byron."

Gibson Gowland intends making another tour for the purpose of making personal appearances at kinemas.

Harley Knoles is now cutting and assembling "The Bohemian Girl" for Alliance.

Florence Turner is to lecture at the Stoll Picture Club on Wednesday next, the subject being "Reminiscences."

Phil Ross was filming at the People's Palace on the occasion of a big Zionists' carnival last Monday.

Gibb McLaughlin has finished playing a leading part in "The Bohemian Girl" for Alliance.

Sydney Folker is studio manager for Quality Films.

Freda Kaye has been engaged to play in "Lord Byron" for Gaumont.

SCHOOLS AND PUPILS THEIR

An Exposure of the Futility of Kinema Training

If there had been in existence some protective organisation for kinema artistes the kinema school evil would never have assumed the proportions it has, nor swindled so many screen-struck fools, nor flooded the market with half-fledged students to the harm of the professional artiste. But the facts must be accepted as they stand. And these show that there is still a great number of crooked schools in existence with, perhaps, one or two (at most) straightforward institutions of this description.

And they are still carrying on their nefarious work despite the fact that one or two of the concerns have been closed down and the proprietors sent to gaol. Because the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO exists to champion the cause of the artiste, to encourage every element that is for the good of the Industry, and condemn everything that will harm it, we intend, during the next few weeks, to tackle this subject, expose the men behind the crook concerns, and so far as is possible purge the Industry of this cancerous growths. In the course of these articles we shall deal with several schools by name, and if at the end of our exposures there remain any screen-struck who are still willing to part with their guineas then the blame must rest on themselves.

We invite all the producing concerns, studio managers, directors, casting directors, and agents to pledge themselves not to engage artistes from any kinema training school. If this is done and the public knows that students are certain of not getting engagements then this in itself will stamp out the evil. We will print every week a list of the names of those who do undertake this pledge.

For the good of the Industry and the improvement of the standard of screen acting something must be done in this matter, because every day these schools are advertising for, and obtaining, more "flats" with their money. We are therefore commencing a campaign to bring before the public and the profession the danger and uselessness of some of these enterprises.

Catchy advertisements daily appearing in the Press, inserted by proprietors of these catch-penny institutions, attract two kinds of fools who in these times answer kinema school advertisements.

First, there is the man or woman who has ample means, and only tries to enter the kinema profession for sheer vanity's sake. They want to see themselves, and show themselves to their friends on the screen. These people are seldom troubled with the thought that perhaps they may be the means of keeping legitimate and experienced artistes out of a job. We are not suggesting that these people are heartless—far from it—they just do not happen to know what every casting director and director in this country knows: that there are hundreds and hundreds of men and women, many of them well advanced in years, striving day after day to keep their home fires burning by doing a little picture work—all of whom have a legitimate right over amateurs from Mayfair to work in the profession to which they have devoted the best years of their life.

The elegants from Mayfair do not know the tragedy of the film artiste's life. There is another person, however, besides the casting director and director who is quite aware of the tragedy, and that is the man who run the kinema schools—he knows, but does not care.

The second class of person who is caught by the advertisement is worthy of more serious consideration. It is often the young man and woman who only have a little money and really do want work, and hope to get some by picture acting. They may also think that, as other people have succeeded and made fortunes by picture acting they might do likewise. Unfortunately, however, only about one in every thousand of these ambitious souls are ever likely to be of the slightest use to a director.

But here again the proprietor of the kinema schools does not tell them so. He takes their fees (perhaps nearly all they have in the world), anything from ten shillings up to twenty guineas. Again, after the first course of so many lessons he may offer to give them a further course—the extra special one that is positively going to finish them off. In many cases it does finish them off—in more ways than one.

These good people may have come up from the country, possibly left good homes, and some of the more foolish ones even good jobs. Many are ex-soldiers.

It may be asked, if all this is true about kinema schools, why does not the L.C.C. shut them up? The reason is, that neither of the two classes of persons described ever seem anxious to take legal steps. The wealthy ones do not miss the money in the first place, and are ashamed to let their friends know through the publicity that a prosecution would cause that they were such idiots as to join a tin-pot school of acting. The others usually exit through the back door of the kinema school possessing nothing with which to start legal proceedings.

Every enterprise must justify its existence, and so some of the proprietors of kinema schools, knowing full well that ninety per cent. of their pupils are useless when they start their course, and are still useless when they have finished it, approach an agent (who to justify his County Council licence must represent and find engagements for artistes), and proposes to him that should he (the agent) be willing to find crowd work for some of the school pupils, he will be pleased to pay him. so much for doing so.

The school proprietor gets big fees from his pupils, and is therefore in a position to pay handsomely for one engagement for these same pupils. This one engagement is absolutely necessary to keep the school proprietor from falling foul of the law, as nearly all those who pay to learn picture acting do so only on condition that they are to obtain work after the completion of their course. The agent has been carefully picked out by the school proprietor as a person not too scrupulous, and he consequently falls in with the scheme.

The next move in this sordid game is that this agent in his turn looks around and eventually succeeds in finding a director who, like himself, is none too particular. The agent then proposes to this director that the latter shall get all his crowd and small part people through him. In return for this the agent offers to go fifty-fifty on the ten per cent. commission that the law allows agents to charge for finding artistes work.

There is also the very cautious promoter and proprietor of kinema schools who, although he uses the same method of "graft" to get his pupils work, openly admits that he does not guarantee work. In some cases he even goes so far as to say that he will refund a portion of the fee should any of his pupils prove, in his opinion, unlikely to become efficient artistes.

Sometimes he actually does return a small portion of the fees, but why does he do this? The reason is that some people, however foolish they may be in parting with their money in the first place, do at times wake up and realise when too late that they have been had. Some occasionally raise a row and threaten to prosecute, and it is these people who immediately have their money refunded, and are told that they will never become efficient.

The school proprietor then makes much of this incident to the other pupils by saying that owing to Mr. or Mrs. So-and-so's incompetence he felt it his duty to refund their fees.

Although this class of school proprietor does not guarantee work, some of them nevertheless use the "graft" method to procure engagements for their pupils, as naturally a school which never obtained a single crowd engagement for any of its pupils would soon cease to be patronised. Thus it is quickly seen that this class of kinema school proprietor and promoter is just as dangerous to the legitimate and experienced artistes as the one who does guarantee work, because he also attracts many unsuitable persons to our already overcrowded profession.

Let us say in conclusion that kinema schools are not wanted in this country. This is the opinion of every right-minded person who has the good of this Industry at heart. Rich amateurs, holding out bribes to directors, are a great danger to any film company which expects to turn out good pictures with the shareholders' money, and the only way to stop the evil is to get all British directors to give an undertaking that they will employ none but legitimate people, who learn their business in the only school, namely, the school of experience. All producing companies should forbid directors to engage pupils from any college.

The sooner the would-be film aspirants from other professions realise that they will not be allowed to come in and choke this already overcrowded industry, the sooner swindlers, like Quigley and Sheldon, will find it impossible to continue their evil and dangerous practices in this country.

Next week we propose to deal with a school that is advertising daily for pupils, and which has, to-day, an advertisement for pupils for a new production just starting. In the meantime we invite readers to communicate with us, in strict confidence, if they have any information that can assist us in our investigations.

THE MYSTERY— —OF EMULSION

by COLIN N. BENNETT, F.R.C.S., F.R.P.S.
Technical Expert to "The Kinematograph Weekly."

THE emulsion on negative and positive film consists of a film of gelatine containing minute granules of silver bromide. Silver bromide particles being milk white, their colour has given the coating its name, for "emulsion" means milk coloured. When light acts on the film a proportion of the milky granules becomes changed so that on pouring over them a photographic developer the bromine in them recombines to form a soluble bromide, and the silver of the granules is reduced to the metallic state in proportion to the amount of exposure received.

What Happens?

It all sounds so simple until you go a step further and begin to ask one or two obvious and elementary questions. For instance, what is it exactly which happens when the silver bromide particles receive a brief exposure to light? And, again, what decides the least amount of light which is able to cause the granules to become developable? And why should a proportion of them only be affected by the light? Why not all? Is the thickness of the emulsion what accounts for this last? Is the reason of the percentage action of incident light simply because the surface granules of the emulsion absorb the radiant energy of the light beam before it can reach the deeper embedded sensitive granules?

And, again, does the emulsion of a plate re-act with a definite ratio of strength for all strengths of light action between the minimum and maximum recordable? And what decided the maxima?

Some Attempted Answers.

As a matter of fact, these problems are so complicated that for the last twenty-five years the best brains of our greatest photographic chemists have been constantly trying to find the true why and wherefore of the matter. And still attempts proceed. In the first place there are various theories to account for the effect of exposure. According to one of them, energy of the light rays charges the silver bromide crystals with electricity, forming photo-electric nuclei.

One thing seems certain: that at the moment of exposure the emulsion parts with a little of its bromine, from which one may fairly arrive at a conclusion that the chemical constitution of developable, light-struck, silver bromide crystals is in some way different from that of the original unexposed crystals. It is, for the sake of calling it something, a photo-bromide. But, since you don't get silver bromide in plain water solution reacting to slight influence of light as you do when embedded in a gelatine film, a reasonable further deduction may be made so that the gelatine enters also, in some way, into the reaction. What that way is no one quite knows. For one thing, gelatine, harmless squashy stuff as it is, represents one of the outstanding mysteries of the modern chemist. Like plain water, it has a simple chemical formula but a bafflingly high molecular complexity.

The Light Question.

Nor can anyone explain why there should be a definite minimum light intensity below which the film emulsion will not register any photographic effect at all. Common sense (sometimes a deceptive thing) helps us over this difficulty by reminding us that for all usual forms of work there is a definite minimum energy needful in making a start, namely, the energy necessary to overcome initial inertia. From which we deduce that a photographic emulsion has inertia too. This fact is well recognised.

Densities.

If you expose small areas of any photographic emulsion to different intensities of light for a certain time, or to the same light intensity for various times, and then develop the film, you will get developed patches of correspondingly different densities. To be exact, you will do this in the region of moderate exposure, from moderately short to moderately long. On plotting the densities against the logarithms of exposure times, the result is a graph, or "curve," which is only technically a curve, for it really runs in a straight diagonal line. This signifies that, within limits, the density of deposit bears a strictly definite and equal relation to the strength of light action giving rise to the photographic image.

As we shall at once see, this is what is needed in order that any plate shall produce faithful records of the actinic values in the original subject photographed. But only for moderate exposure times is this true of any plate. Where the exposure is so short as to be near the plate's minimum recording point the density-exposure curve takes a curl up, and flattens out. Similarly, for over-long exposures the top of the curve comes down and again flattens out.

H. & D. Numbers.

Hence, in ascertaining the latitude of a plate, it is important to see how much of its speed reading plots out as a straight line graph. Photographic chemists are for ever trying to combine actual high speed with as great a capacity for true proportional density rendering as possible. To find the Hurter and Driffield speed number of an emulsion the straight line portion of the plate speed curve is produced downwards till it cuts the abscissa of the graph, and the reading at the point of junction is divided into the number thirty-four. All Hurter and Driffield speed numbers should be obtained from readings of plates developed with ferrous oxalate developer. By using more energetic developers much higher speed numbers can be got. They are not strictly speaking the true H. and D. numbers, and emulsion makers who label their fast plates or films with a high H. and D. number and add, in brackets (with metol developer), or some other notoriously rapid-acting one, are hoodwinking the buyer, and, at the same time, playing off a rather "smart" trick on their brother manufacturers.

Still a Mystery.

There was another question raised at the beginning of this short article: Why do only a proportion of the silver bromide granules develop? Undoubtedly, in ordinary photographic emulsions, where many layers of silver bromide crystals are piled over each other in the thickness of the film, shielding effect of the outermost layers accounts for a great deal. F. C. Toy, in recent papers read by him before the Royal Photographic Society, has gone far to show that this is by no means the full explanation of percentage light action, for even where the gelatine film has only a single layer of silver bromide crystals they still do not all become equally developable when subjected to the same light exposure. What is more, much of the unaccountable difference in effect of light action as between crystal and crystal still remains though crystals be of the same size, shape, thickness, and total volume. It is all very interesting and the more one reads or thinks of it the more one realises how much still remains to be found out about the theory of exposure and development.

With this issue we commence publication of a new series of special articles, by Hugh E. Wright. They record the philosophic utterances of a super both in connection with the stage and the studio.

SUPER PHILOSOPHY ^{by HUGH E. WRIGHT}

1.—MORE SUPER THAN PHILOSOPHY.

I won't tell you where I first met the Super; for all I know you may not be worthy of the beer they sell there.

I went into the saloon bar one evening, after the matinée, and found two yards of human being, three feet of which were twined loosely about a high stool in the corner, while the remaining three spraddled over the counter, and were apparently engaged in pointing out to the barmaid the uselessness of a borrowed match without a fill of 'baecy to go with it.

I ordered beer for myself, but felt I could do no less than offer him my pouch.

He filled his pipe carefully, while he fixed me with a fishy eye. Still with that disconcerting optic upon me, he transferred at least a third of the remaining contents of my pouch to a waistcoat pocket. Then he handed it back to me, with the remark: "Dry, ain't it?"

I showed him my coat and hat as evidence that it was pouring outside.

"I wasn't thinkin' so much of outside," he said, and added, "I'm on the boards!"

I blushed at my obtuseness and ordered him beer. I don't pretend to be an artiste myself, but I realise the artistic temperament is oblivious to mere outside happenings. He spoke in symbols; it was his soul which was arid.

I gave him beer; I am interested in souls. You cannot get the full meaty flavour out of a dry soul. I gave him more beer. Do not be shocked. I did not give him too much—I couldn't afford it. I only opened the sluice-gates a trifle and washed some truths out of him.

"Been to the Lane?" asked my friend the Super suddenly.

I had, that very afternoon, and I told him so.

"Then you saw me," he continued. "Don't worry to think 'oo I am, or say 'ow much you liked my performance; you'd only go and put yer foot in it," he added. "Rightly speakin', I'm not a actor at all. I'm wot they calls a 'super.' You know—enter with crowd R, stand where they tells yer, shout 'Ah!' and exit L." He paused thoughtfully. "Sounds easy, don't it? But you 'as to keep jus' as sober as wot the actors do, if not more so; and if you do overstep—Gawd!—yer might be 'Enery Ainley, Owen Nares, an' Martin 'Arvey, all rolled inter one, the way they carry on. Stage-managers! Gawd!"

He gave me a smile of grim amusement, emptied his tankard, and resumed:

"'You've ruined the scene!' 'e says. 'Little enough ter do and can't think o' that!' 'e says. 'Some o' you ruddy men don't never seem ter use yer brains!' 'e says—'if you've got any ruddy brains!' 'e says. I didn't say nothin'; I can swallow an insult if they'll let me keep my beer-money. And all becos I'd come on in the garden-party scene with my Apache trousers still on! A mistake, I own; but yer can't throw down a nap 'and just becos the bell rings, can yer? You got to allow for 'uman nature. If some o' them leadiu' actors thought more about art, and less about the creases in their trousis, there wouldn't be so much talk about the decline of the Dramer."

He looked into his tankard thoughtfully, I gave him something to look at. He drank it.

"Not that I've always been a super," he continued. "I've been a regular actor too. There ain't much in the artistic line that I 'aven't been—come ter that! Even to drawing shilling caricatures at the old Aquarium, and a troupe of performin' fleas at the 'All by the Sea. It's itchy work feed-in' them, specially if you've got a tender skin like I 'ave.

"'Ave I been a actor? Arsk me! Why, I've played 'Amlet.' There ain't much in Shakespeare as I 'aven't played, nor 'Fast Lynne' if it comes ter that. Everythin', down to little Willie. And that was funny too. The local council at Widnes 'ad insisted on the kid we used being out of the theatre by nine-thirty. The chairman owned the local kinema and we was doing all the business—see! Well, what was we to do? Had to have the death scene. As the guv'nor says, if we don't send 'em away crying we might as well shut to-morrer night. I don't want to brag, but in an emergency the guv'nor allus used to come to me. 'Could you play little Willie?' 'e says. 'Why not?' says I. And I could 'ave done if the bed 'adn't been two foot six too short. I couldn't put me knees up, or I'd 'ave 'id me face; so I stuck my legs through the bars, and they covered 'em with sky border. The trouble with me is I'm too emotional; I couldn't be a dying child from the waist upwards, and keep me legs like graven images. I got 'em cryin' all right; and then the border started slipping, and I got 'em laughing. They 'ad to ring the curtain down on us. But under no provocation ought a lady to talk to 'er child like Lady Isabel spoke to me. She was the guv'nor's wife, and I got the sack. 'E'd 'ave taken it 'imself if 'e 'adn't been married to 'er.

"And now I'm a super! A bit of a come-down, you'd think, and yet I don't know. Super—a term of degradation! Means 'superior,' don't it? And that's funny. We does our job same as the star does 'is, only we don't ask for applause—'aven't got the nerve, per'aps; anyway, we don't get it. 'Each man in life plays many parts,' eh? So I do, if I am only one of the crowd. After all, it's just as well ter be one of the crowd at a funeral, ain't it? And you never know. Gawd! I gets talkin'; never noticed you'd filled up. Here's the best!"

ARTIST OR MECHANIC?

MANY people are apt to overlook the fact that a cameraman should not be merely a highly skilled workman, but an artist, whose work is of such a delicate nature that he must possess an eye for all that is beautiful and be able to arrange a picture in much the same way as the artist who uses oils on canvas. In this respect cameramen are born, not made, but years of study are also necessary to master the intricacies of the kine. camera, to understand the settings of lights, the developing of the negative, composition, and other such matters appertaining to the work.

To possess a thorough knowledge of the working of the camera and all the other matters in connection with the work is not sufficient to make a cameraman—although there are many such cameramen in existence to-day.

The similarities between the cameraman and the artist are many. A cameraman can help materially in creating the atmosphere in the making of a picture. The cameraman who is merely a skilled workman is usually intent most of the time in getting his pictures perfectly sharp and well lit all through, whether it be a death-bed scene or a children's picnic. He is so engrossed with the mechanical side that he loses sight of the artistic, and while his photography is, no doubt, good, it is not in keeping with the picture. He does not feel the character of a scene—he is all intent upon getting the photography sharp—and in so doing has little time to devote to help create the atmosphere.

A cameraman who can combine the qualities of an expert mechanic and an artist is indeed worth having. Unfortunately companies who possess such cameramen do not realise the fortunate position they are in, and when the time comes they will find themselves minus a cameraman. It is then they will realise what an attribute a real cameraman is, and what a difference he can make to a picture.

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

THIS week's meeting was well attended, and many interesting discussions were brought forward during the evening.

A letter was read from George Woods-Taylor, which said that he would be home on April 18. In his letter he thanked the Society for the honour it was paying him in arranging to hold the annual dinner in honour of his return.

Speaking on the subject of the dinner, Kenneth Gordon said that a large committee had been elected to go into the matter, but so far he had had no reports in. It was, however, his intention to go into the matter himself and find a suitable place to hold such an affair.

Ernest R. Strehler gave a very interesting discourse on the principle of the working of the new De Brie ultra rapid camera, which Pathé and Gaumont are now using.

It was pointed out that certain cameramen had been undercutting their brother cameramen in the matter of wages. The secretary appealed to all members to try to make all cameramen discontinue such a practice. He gave instances where wages had been undercut and showed how dangerous it was to every cameraman if even in one case such a thing happened.

The Ahelcy camera, which is used extensively in America, was discussed, and a catalogue was shown to the members.

The meeting closed at an early hour, but there was quite a lot of private business gone through.

SUBSTITUTES

I. ROSENTHAL, Bert Ford, D. P. Cooper, and L. G. Egrot, employed some idle hours at the club trying to find out the best means to evolve an equivalent to the Sunlight arc.

After an arduous argumentation, it was generally agreed that the thing that mattered in the Sunlight arc was the sunlight and that, taking sunlight as such, the most portable form of sunlight was undoubtedly the well known product of the Lever Bros.

Once this great point had been decided, the rest was plain sailing.

The cameramen agreed on a mean cost of the unit of electricity, which was taken at the rate of 6d. per unit.

Thence:

If one Sunlight arc burns 175 amps. on a tension of 100 volts, the number of units required will be 17.5, which at the rate of 6d., will give eight shillings and ninepence.

Now—and this is where the practical side of the problem will be self evident—a bar of Sunlight soap costs 7d., the number of bars required to obtain the same result will be 8s. 9d. divided by 7d., and a child of elementary education will find fifteen bars, which is most easy to pack and carry to the most inaccessible locations.

N.B.—It is essential that the soap used should be absolutely in a dry state.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

Charlie Heath had a very busy time at Tottenham last week, filming the match between Cardiff and Spurs. It was a fine day for filming, and there was plenty to film.

The Pathé studio staff had some excitement one day last week, when "Pip," "Squeak" and "Wilfred" arrived for Kenneth Gordon to take their photographs. The filming eventually took place, although it had to be abandoned for some time, while the staff formed itself into a hunting party, and chased the animals round the studio.

I am told that "Byron" will be filmed by both A. St. Brown and Basil Emmott.

While at Torquay filming the exteriors of "A Bachelor's Baby," Leslie Eveleigh was receiving a wire from London every day at about eleven o'clock in the morning, giving him the "O.K." on the previous day's taking, and by the next morning's post, print cuttings for examination. Every night the exposed negative was sent up to London by train, and a man at Paddington took the film to Davidson's at Walthamstow, where Griffin, the chief of the laboratories down there, had his baths at a constant temperature and ready for developing. After personally seeing to the work, he subjected the negative to a careful examination, and then wired the result to Torquay.

Teddy Day has been filming for the new Mutual Company, and has completed work on his first production, "His Wife's Sweetheart."

The Around the Town cameraman visited Lingfield the other week and secured some interesting ultra-rapid pictures of the horses taking the jump. The fruits of his labour were to be seen in last week's "Around the Town." The noise of the camera, while taking, nearly got those in charge of it put off the course.

Another scoop for Around the Town was the photos of the gardens in Olympia, when by means of sunlight arcs a shot was obtained of Queen Alexandra in a replica of her favourite garden at Sandringham.

A. E. Coleby's next Stoll production is evidently going to have a bit of racing in it. D. P. Cooper, who is photographing for Coleby, is quite a frequent visitor to the various racecourses just now, and can be seen at almost any of them with his camera.

Bert Ford, with the assistance of D. P. Cooper, has succeeded in pocketing all the snooker balls in one game without using his hands or anything, except a cue. Naturally Ford is proud of this achievement, although I doubt if those members of the Kinema Club, who are waiting to use the billiard table after him, regarded it in the same light.

YOUR CORNER

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

LENDING SUPPORT.

May I express, through the medium of your paper, how happy we should all be at our club?

Those members who think intelligently about the subject at all must see what a good thing it is, and support it financially in every way they can.

Five minutes (or even less) clear thinking from each member will show how this can be done: by making use of the excellent buffet and accommodation, and attending all the concerts and amusements they possibly can, also by sending in their names quickly for the film.

Only by these means can really be shown practical appreciation, for, after all, sentimental resolutions are never sufficient to guarantee anything.—VIOLET BELMORE.

"DIRECTOR."

I am glad to observe, in a recent issue of your paper, that I am supported in my contention regarding the use of the word "Director" as applied to the producer of a motion picture or photoplay.

A photoplay is created; it is evolved, it is produced. The result is a production, it can be seen, it can be talked about. The production is produced by the producer. But a director is one who directs (he might even direct the producer up to a point), he is a mere supervisor. Can it be said that he directs a direction? If so, what is a direction? Is it something that can be seen and talked about? We make reference to a beautiful production. Can we refer to a beautiful direction?

By calling a man who produces a beautiful photoplay a mere director is sure to be little him. Such a term has no significance. He does much more than direct. He spends hours over his scenario, evolving his scenes, creating the effects he wishes, concentrating his whole mind on something more than merely directing. He produces a result—something to show.

In your editorial comment upon my first letter you say, "Photoplays are not like the conjuror's rabbit—just produced." I cannot refrain from retorting that neither are they just directed as, for example, a ventriloquist just directs his voice and can make his figure appear to talk through his hat if necessary.

No, sir, the two terms are not synonymous, and in England, at any rate, have no relation to each other. We have used the word "Producer" ever since we began to produce, and it conveys exactly what is meant, without causing the confusion that is inevitable if the word "Director" is substituted.

Your paper is young, but has already attained considerable influence, and I beg you will use that influence to uphold our own British traditions.—A. HARDING STEERMAN.

COME RIGHT IN!

If you are passing, or if you want to ask a question, or if you have some news, or if you want to have a chat over the business—come right in! We are anxious to maintain close personal touch with all our readers. We are putting you first all the time—you and your interests are our chief concern, and we want to emphasise that you have a perfect right to come in and regard our time as being at your disposal. CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

Last week-end was a bumper, and no mistake, and those who had a finger in the pie are to be heartily congratulated. Saturday's dance was highly successful, Sunday's concert was ditto. If the Entertainments Committee can keep this up, 9, Great Newport Street will be a popular rendezvous.

For fifteen minutes the dance was held up while a pleasant ceremony was performed. George Ridgwell, as chairman of the Club, presented Ernest G. Allighan with a gold watch from (as the inscription put it) "a few grateful members of the Kinema Club" in appreciative recognition of his work as Founder of the Club. The secretary made suitable reply, and expressed the belief that the darkest days in the profession had now passed, and he looked forward to a future of prosperity and usefulness for them all. Mrs. Allighan was also presented with a bejewelled gold and platinum brooch.

There was not seating accommodation for all who wanted to crowd into the men's lounge for the Sunday night concert, so popular was it. At the centre table sat "the Chairman and his friends," after the fashion of fifty years ago. Sydney Paxton was made up to play the part of Chairman, and he will go down in history as playing the dual rôle of Sydney Paxton and Chairman with consummate skill—it was as Chairman that he lifted the foaming tankard and as Sydney that he paid a tribute to Arthur Roberts, whose turn was cheered to the echo. The other artistes (all of such superlative calibre that to discriminate is as dangerous as it is unfair) were George Grafton, Elsie Donald, Frank Grey, Joan Lockton, Bertram Burleigh, W. McCarthy, Arthur Preston, W. Davidson, Maud Yates, Flora le Breton and A. B. Imeson. Rex Davis, as chairman of the Entertainments Committee, thanked all who had contributed, as well as the organisers, Ruhama Catton, Dick Webb and Harry J. Worth.

The caterer asks me to announce that he has now secured a new chef. This man, it appears, is a wonderful cook straight from the Carlton and the Ritz in America, and his specialities are the famous American dishes. In future a special feature will be made of these American dishes at both luncheon and dinner.

Tickets are already on sale for the "Kinema Klub Carnival," which is being held at the Hotel Cecil on Wednesday, April 26, dancing to commence at 9 p.m. and continue until 3 a.m. This fancy dress ball will be the first that has ever been held by kinema artistes in London, and the demand for tickets has already set in very strongly. As there is, of necessity, a limited supply, application for tickets must be made immediately: Members of the Club can secure tickets for 15s. each; non-members, 25s. each; and doubles, £2 7s. 6d. each. Tickets can be obtained from this office; Billie Bristow (the organiser), at 175, Wardour Street (Gerr. 240); Rex Davis, or the members of the Entertainment Committee. The price of the ticket includes a four-course supper, in addition to a running buffet.

David Robertson visited the Club during the week-end and has transferred his impressions of some of the outstanding personalities to this page. On left is a drawing of Sydney Paxton, who camouflaged his identity so cleverly as "that old-fashioned chairman of mine." Above will be found a scene from "The Army of the Dead," with A. B. Imeson in a characteristic pose; while Flora Le Breton (at top of page) charmed everybody with her song.

WHO'S WHERE.

Several directors have explained to us the difficulty they have of getting quickly into touch with artistes and others whom they need for their productions, and have suggested that we publish addresses and telephone numbers of such.

Commercial War.

IT is essential to the future prosperity of the British motion picture industry that all engaged or interested in it should obtain a clear view of the position as it now is. That America has controlled the film markets of the world is too well known to require repetition, but what has never been courageously faced is the fact that for the British motion pictures to secure a good commercial standing a state of intense competition must exist between the American and the British film producing industries. This is an elementary fact, but one that is often overlooked.

TAKING a survey of the American producing field we are impressed by the fact that so soon as American pictures are considered the name of D. W. Griffith springs to mind. This is significant in this way: there is no outstanding British director whom one instantly thinks of in connection with British films. And it is this absence of genius that is one of the causes of British mediocrity. To be horribly and brutally candid with ourselves, we have to admit that we have no master-director, and no first-grade directors. Or—to be scrupulously fair—no first-grade directors have, as yet, revealed themselves. This is due, primarily, to the fact that the circumstances of the British motion picture industry are ranged up with a bias against true directorship. So long as there are cheese-paring policies, unwarrantable interference by studio-managers, tyrannous oversight by managing directors, just so long must those engaged in the direction of productions be handicapped and repressed. Directors must be given a big chance; they must be allowed to work out their own ideas and control the productions on which they work with no undue interference or petty annoyances. When people complain that there is no British D. W. Griffith we retort that there would have been no American D. W. Griffith if he had had to conform to the irksome restrictions that British directors have to face daily.

Killing Individuality.

ONLY recently there was publicity given to the case of a director who complained that the print of his negative as Trade shown (and badly "jumped on" by the critics) was absolutely different from the completed and edited "neg." which he handed over to the firm. His allegations were that wholesale alterations, cuts, re-hashes and insets had been made into his finished film. And while this domestic quarrel is no concern of ours, we must admit that had the early pictures of D. W. Griffith received treatment such as was alleged, then the film world would have lost its foremost director and probably the engineering world would have gained an indifferent draughtsman. The whole point is that, as so much depends upon them, our directors must be given every opportunity to develop their own personality and ideas; the mind-destroying policy that would kill a director's individuality must be dropped

¶ As a man thinks—so he is. And if you want to be Big, and do Big you must first of all Think Big.

Small-minded people always fill small spheres. Narrow-visioned people never see the wide horizon of hope. They get so small-souled that they could dance on the point of a needle without slipping off. But they never accomplish anything worth while.

¶ Get a lofty mind, a wide outlook; a long vision and the Big Tasks will be achieved by you.

if British pictures are to be lifted to the level which will adequately combat the American output.

Artistes and Their Art.

ON the subject of artistes we can learn something by comparison with the opponent. It is in no spirit of carping criticism and with no pro-American ideas that we have to deplore the paucity of front-rank artistes. America can reel off a string of them—we have not half a dozen artistes with a world-wide following. Our artistes do not evidence the consummate skill of the Italian artistes nor the soulful emotion of the Swedish, nor the vivacity of the French nor the all-round technique of the Americans. Not that this is necessarily the fault of our artistes. It is to a certain extent, we admit. Very few of our artistes have taken their work seriously enough to make them, for instance, study the science of dramatic technique. Screen acting is not a joke, nor a pastime, nor merely a job; it is an art the exhibition of which throws a public duty on its exponents.

Mishandled Artistes.

BUT, as we say, it is not all the fault of the artistes. They have to fight the handicap of inefficient directors, wretched studio conditions, and miserable salaries. It is unfair to expect an artiste to do his best work when mishandled by the director, and we are inclined to think that very often the Press critics condemn the faulty work of an artiste when all the time it is due to bad direction. For, after all, an artiste has to do as the director commands. For faulty direction is more often than not the cause of faulty performances, although of course, there are the other matters of the conditions that obtain in some studios—and the salary standards. It is hardly fair to expect an artiste to come from a wretched, freezing, untidy dressing-room in a mental condition for enacting a quiet love scene.

Policy of the Pin-Pricks.

THERE is one department of work in which we can compare favourably with the Americans; our photography is quite on a high level. We have British cameramen who are highly efficient photographers and whose work is often better than some of the best American cinematography. And this, despite terrible climatic and atmospheric conditions for exteriors and poverty of lighting equipment for interiors. This may be due to the fact that it is the department of production where there is the least outside interference. Because, all the weaknesses of British productions resolve themselves down to this one focussing point: absence of right organisation. This reflects itself in the set of adverse circumstances in which directors and artistes have to work. The policy that has to obtain is that of regarding men and women as people of personal intelligence, able to perform their various duties without the wretched system of pin-pricks that now makes life and work in some studios almost unbearable and anything but conducive to high-grade output.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Hearty congratulations to George Wynne on his marriage to Irene Cubitt, which took place at Croydon last Saturday. Mrs. Wynne is the daughter of Robert Cubitt, a Governmental official. George is such an incorrigible work-hog that the wedding was not allowed to interfere with his studio duties; he is still hard at it directing for Master Films at Teddington.

The worst has happened. Lupino

Lane has been made a Pawnee Indian! It seems that recently while on a film-making stunt for the Fox Film Co. in America he encountered the remnants of this once blood-thirsty tribe of Indians. Whilst watching the filming, the chief of the tribe saw "Nipper" turn one of the famous Lupino somersaults over a fallen tree, and was so astonished at the little man's agility that he at once notified his intention of inviting Mr. Lane to become a "blood brother." The following Sunday Lupino Lane was welcomed into the tribe with full ceremony and a film taken of the proceedings, which will be released in this country shortly.

Down at Great Missenden, a delightful Bucks village, is the Stoll company that is being directed by Sinclair Hill in "Expiation," and Malcolm Tod, who is playing one of the most important parts in this, writes me a typically Tod-ish letter. He says they are having a most amusing time trying to take summer shots in the snow and raiding the village shops to buy presents for each other. He says: "There is a ripping view from my bedroom window and I get great inspirations for forthcoming love scenes while dressing. . . . Opposite is a butcher's shop." But I fail to see the connection.

* * *

Such are the uncertainties of film work that Adrian Brunel has not returned to town yet. I waited two hours in the rain at Waterloo to cheer as the train steamed in, but there was no Brunel party. When I reached the office it was to find a letter from Granada saying that H.M. the Weather had delayed their return. "Thank goodness we insured against bad weather," writes Miles Mander, the leading man. "When working the other day it blew, rained, snowed, hailed and sunned all within five minutes!" Mander tells me that they found the Spanish people anything but helpful, and adds: "Brunel was in some doubt as to whether to make his villain a Greek or a Spaniard, but that doubt no longer exists." I gather that the Brunel party should be in town by the time this issue appears.

This week Daisy Burrell popped in to see me on her return from Cardiff, where she has been making a great hit in the title rôle in the pantomime "Cinderella." It will be remembered that Miss Burrell's last film work was in the feminine lead in "Pride of the Fancy," which has just been released "Lord Byron," and had a very interesting chat to Howard Gaye, who is playing Lord Byron. A. G. Hunter kept everybody in good humour by his witticisms in announcing the guests at the reception, and Cyril Percival wanted to tell everybody of the joyous evening the night before when Lord Byron had to get drunk in the conservatory.

* * *

By the way, "Lord Byron" is a credit to the costumier, who has made every artiste look true to type and true to period with an accuracy that is perfectly wonderful. And I should like to congratulate Captain Calvert on the way in which he is

MEN BEHIND GAUMONT PRODUCTIONS:—Cyril Smith, Will Kelline, Bernard Bromhead, Captain Calvert, and Pat Digan in the front row, with A. St. A. Brown (Debie Camera) and Basil Emmott (Willard Camera) standing.

I am glad to know that her heart is still with films, and she is hoping to be back in studio work again.

* * *

Chatting to Majorie Hume at the Gaumont Studio this week I learned that she had been through a very bad fortnight. An abscess made its painful appearance on her gums, and after being doctored and dentisted she went for a brief rest to Paris, and has now returned fit and well to play the very important part of Lady Byron in "Lord Byron." And right charming did she look in her beautiful gown.

* * *

It was a very delightful afternoon that I spent there, by the way. I met a crowd of acquaintances from the Club who are all playing parts in handling the artistes; his system of grouping is quite an advance on the usual higgledy-piggledy methods that often obtain.

* * *

Again George K. Arthur, of "Kipps" fame, has sprung a surprise on everybody. On Tuesday he announced his engagement to Melba Lloyd. (Tuesday, by the way, was the first of spring, and we all know where young men's fancy turns just about that time.) Best wishes to both, and may the sun never cease to shine on the happy pair.

"IN THE FLESH."

Public Appearance of Artistes.

As briefly announced in our last issue, we have completed the organisation of a Special Department for the negotiation of the Personal Appearances of Kinema Artistes at public functions. Already a number of artistes have communicated with us on this matter, and as there is a steady demand from exhibitors and others for visits from artistes, this venture is an assured success, with beneficial results to the artistes.

There is an important reason for the establishment of this department. A film artiste can do herself much good by appearing at public functions—or she can do herself infinite harm. It is absolutely fundamental that what an artiste does, both in and out of the studio, contributes to her popularity and maintains the dignity of her professional position. But there have been in the past cases of artistes making personal appearances at functions which have done neither. No artiste can afford to spoil herself (or himself) with the public. A personal appearance must do more than interest the public or make the function successful—it must benefit the artiste.

The benefit to the artiste should be an improved reputation in the Trade, a greater popularity among the public and an enhanced value in the studio. If this does not result, then the visit has been worse than wasted. Because of its very close connection with both exhibitors and renters, our associate journal, the Kinematograph Weekly is able to combine with the STUDIO in helping artistes in this matter.

The Artistes Publicity Department exists to put artistes into touch with those kinemas and functions requiring personal visits, which visits, we know, can only be of benefit to the artiste. There is no charge either to the artiste or the exhibitor for this, which is only one of the small services which the STUDIO exists to do for the artistes. All that is now required is for artistes who are willing to make personal appearances to communicate with the manager of this department at this office.

THE first meeting of the newly formed Producers Association was held at the Bedford Head Hotel, Tottenham Court Road, on Friday evening, March 17, the following being present: Percy Nash, Manning Haynes, Fred Paul, Edwin Collins, Bert Haldane, Jack Denton, W. Kellino, Donald Crisp, Hugh Croise, Kenneth Gracme, Capt. Calvert, A. V. Bramble, and Martin Thornton. Letters and telegrams of regret at absences were received from Duncan MacRae, Geoffrey Malins, Thomas Bentley, A. E. Coleby, Sinclair Hill, Sydney Morgan, and others whose prior engagements prevented them from being present. W. G. Faulkner, chairman pro tem, presided.

The business before the meeting was marked by unanimity and good feeling. It was unanimously agreed that the name of the Association be "The British Film Producers Association," and it was agreed that affiliation with the Motion Picture Directors Association should be effected as soon as the necessary preliminaries were accomplished.

Those present with all who had acquiesced in the formation of the Association were then constituted by resolution, as members of the Association, subject to the definition of membership qualification, fixed by the executive committee to be appointed at the next meeting.

The declared objects of the Association were agreed to as follows:—

- The promotion of good fellowship and the interchange of ideas for the mutual benefit of every member.
- The discussion from time to time of subjects which tend to advance the qualities of pictures.
- The protection of the industry against unqualified persons who secure capital and produce pictures that lower the standard, and are inimical to the progress and prosperity of the British Film industry.

The executive committee was constituted as follows: Fred Paul, Donald Crisp, A. V. Bramble, A. E. Coleby, Edward Collins, Martin Thornton and Hugh Croise.

To this committee was referred the question of definition of qualification of membership, the annual subscription, the question of dealing with the legal work of members, and of providing a publicity organisation.

Percy Nash was then elected first president of the Association, and in returning thanks said he would do everything in his power to forward the interests of the Association.

W. G. Faulkner having vacated the chair, after formally installing the new president, was unanimously requested to act as honorary secretary and treasurer, to which he agreed.

An invitation is to be sent to all directors to join the Association as founder members.

The first meeting of the executive committee was held last night (Friday).

SCREEN AUTHORSHIP.—II.

by Sidney Morgan

TO those living in the past, and to the majority of those living in the present, it seems incredible and impossible for an author to spend six months on a "mere scenario," and yet that is the amount of time he should spend on it—unless he feels that he could make a better job of it if he spent twelve months!

However well an author is paid, he must be the cheapest item in film production, because he works alone. There are no salaries, rents, staff, retaining fees, and overheads connected with his work. Improving the standard of British production has raised the average cost of films from £250 to £1,500 per reel (we have been told of productions costing nearly £10,000 per reel).

There has been no improvement in the standard of authorship, the most important item, which involves the smallest anxiety and expenditure of money. It still stands at the £250 level. Six months to write a "mere scenario" on which £10,000, perhaps £50,000, is going to be spent, is what the poor author needs.

There are novelists who "knock off" a book in two weeks, but Hall Caine spent five years on "The Woman Thou Gavest Me." It works out at about eight words a day.

How? . . . Why?

The answer is that the writer was Hall Caine and the book "The Woman Thou Gavest Me."

Directors, renters, exhibitors, are all at their wits end. If it is only because "trade is bad," then there is little hope of any of us surviving. Is it not mainly to be attributed to the fact that the wonder of the screen is now a thing of the past. The world has been fairly well exploited, camera tricks and amazing stunts have reached their limit, pageant and spectacle cease to amaze, the glamour and fascination of the million-dollar artistes has become by ceaseless repetition just the ordinary everyday thing.

Surely we have reached the day when "The play's the thing." The exhibitor knows this. The present booking position of a film is—hopeless failure, or enormous success.

There was recently Trade shown film A: Photography fair; acting moderate; staging just passable; production cost probably £2,500 to £3,000; but—there were a dozen good laughs and three or four situations in the story.

Result—enormous success.

There was a Trade show of film B: Photography excellent; acting almost perfect; staging beyond reproach; production cost probably between £7,000 and £10,000; but—the story did not matter.

Result—hopeless failure.

And there are dozens of B's, and very few A's.

A will make a profit to the producers of £5,000 and B a loss of £5,000. What is the author's value?

Six months to write a mere scenario, and we haven't thought of the possibility of the rest of the world.

Production is so easy and full houses are so certain—if the story is there why not encourage authorship, the cheapest thing in film production?

WHO CAN TELL?

Just in order to give readers the opportunity to display their mental ingenuity, we print the following queries which Freda Kaye put to us, and on which the editorial brain-box worked for ten solid hours (plus liquid refreshment) without finding a reply, and this despite the fact that Freda Kaye set the pace by answering her first three queries. We pass them on in the faint hopes that our readers can solve the problems.

Why was Olaf Hytten?
Because he tried to send Walter West.

What gave Douglas Payne?
Being rubbed the wrong way by Emery.

How has Maudie Dunham?
By taking her Hook to Holland.

And now readers are invited to grapple with the following intricate problems:—

What was Harry Worth?

SUPER PHILOSOPHY

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

II. Through Fire and Water

The Super had just finished his third tankard when the fire-engine came past the door with a whizz and a rattle. We rushed to the window and peered vainly into the gathering dusk.

"Fire somewhere!" I suggested fatuously.

"Ah, it's too early for mushrooms," he agreed, sarcastically.

I tried to put myself right with a fourth tankard. He accepted it in silence as his due.

"Dreadful things, fires," said I.

"Ah, you're right there," he replied, with a trace of emotion in his voice. "I lost my all in a fire once."

"Insured, I hope?" I queried.

"No," he answered sombrely. "I ought to 'a finished it in the first 'ouse," he added, enigmatically. He drained his tankard. "A fire in a theatre is a horrible thing," he continued, after a pause.

"The risk of panic in the audience—awful!" I agreed.

"I wasn't thinking o' that so much," he admitted. "But it's a funny thing it always seems to start on your best line. Fate, I suppose. Though there was one fire—"

Unobtrusively I had his tankard refilled. "Tell me," said I.

"I was working for Bill Otley at the time," he began. "He had a portable on the meadows at Itchingham. I'll always remember that place. It's the name being peculiar, per'aps. It synchronised with the digs I 'ad there, too. Down on the meadows we were, and the river run past the fields not fifty yards from us. There was a tear in the canvas of my dressing-room I used to watch 'em fishing through on matinée days. When I say my dressing-room I mean the company's dressing-room with screen—Bill Otley insisted on the screen, us being only seven mile from Winchester—and that a cathedral town."

"Well—not to put too fine a point on it—we wasn't a success! Mind you, the company was loyal to old Otley. That's one thing about actors, they are loyal—or 'opeful; maybe they thought there was a chance of getting enough of their salary for the farc 'ome. They say 'opefulness is a sign of the artistic temperament—but actors aren't the only ones. I've known landladies 'oo very near lived on it. . . . Actors aren't fair to landladies; they talks about the cruet. If an actor ever tells me yarns about 'a shilling for the cruet' I always says, 'Well, you're only paying a bit of what the manager owed the other actor what didn't pay the landlady.' There's two sides to every cruet."

"We were doing a different show every night, an' none of 'em clicked. Shakespeare was above their heads, and Maria Martin was beneath contempt. P'raps it was partly Bill Otley's fault; 'e would play the 'eavy leads, an' though he was a 'eavy drinker, that was about all the weight 'e carried."

"Well, one night, in spite of 'is paying us no salaries, 'e got depressed. 'E'd said 'Ave a drink' to me and another man before counting the night's takings, and then 'e counted 'em and found 'e was tuppence short, which 'e borrowed from me."

"Suddenly Bill 'as an idea. I knew something 'ad 'appened cos 'e put down 'is glass before it was empty. There was a young chap in the bar wot wrote things for the Itchingham Gazette. Bill goes up to 'im. 'It might be worth while to be at the Theatre Royal ter-morrer night,' 'e says."

"'I've criticised the show once," he answers. 'Aint that enough for yer?'

"'More than enough,' says Bill, having read the paper, 'but I ain't asking for criticism this time; I'm asking for a unbiased report on a event of public interest' which may very well turn out to be a tragedy."

"'I've been to your show twice,' says the young chap, 'an' your acting is a tragedy at any time,' 'e says."

"Bull swallowed with a effort, and eventually the chap agrees to be there for a couple of bob, a shilling of which has to be paid in advance, and which Bill borrows from the landlord."

"'Wot's the game,' says I to Bill, afterwards."

"'I'll tell yer,' 'e answers. 'There's going to be a fire to-morrer night. We'll 'ave it in the third act. You'll all rush on and tell me, and then fly like cowards; but I'll stick on the stage like a 'ero and sing to the audience to avert a panic.'

"'Your singing to the audience won't avert a panic,' says I. 'More likely start one.'

ALTER THE CLOCK !

Summer time comes into force this Sunday morning so you must put the hands of the clock forward o e hour
This SATURDAY Night.

"'Well, I'll recite, then,' says 'e."

"'But supposing you gets burned,' says I."

"'You chuckle-head, it ain't going to be a real fire. It's going to be "Arry 'ere at the back with a Bengal light. An' if they won't come in to see a nactor, maybe they will when they sees in the paper the next day that I'm a 'ero as well.'

"Well, with the 'elp of a lot of free seats we got sixty in that night. It was a mistake 'aving the fire in the third act, though; 'cos by that time there was only fifteen of 'em left. The play was 'The Murdered Marquis,' and they'd stayed in the 'opes that Bill might be the Marquis in disguise."

"It all went off as Bill arranged. We shouted 'Fire!' and bolted, 'Arry let off the Bengal light, and Bill made a speech: 'Ladies and gents,' 'e says, 'there is no danger. Though I 'ave been deserted by my cowardly confreres I will remain at my post and recite 'Casabianca' while you goes out in a orderly manner and thus avert a panic."

"Well—it might 'ave been alright if it 'adn't been for two mistakes," says the Super. "One was we gave a free seat to the local fireman. The way 'e got 'is engine down and the 'ose up from the river was a marvel."

"An' the other mistake?" I queried.

"Bill would always recite with 'is eyes shut," said the Super, sadly. "Even Casabianca wouldn't 'ave stood on the burning deck with the 'ose turned on 'im, I'll bet. Bill 'ad got to the fifth verse when a stream of water caught him in the middle and sent him clean through the back-cloth on to the remains of the Bengal fire. So there 'e was, between fire and water, so to speak, and Bill wasn't partial to the water."

"It was the first fire they'd 'ad in Itchingham for years, and the local fireman wasn't going to lose any of it. By the time 'e 'ad finished the Theatre Royal was awash, and Bill was paddling about in the ruins of his props, reciting some more. 'E left first thing in the morning, an' I never saw 'im or my tuppence again."

ORGANISING THE ARTISTES

by H. R. BARBOR

(Editor: The Actor.)

THERE is much talk nowadays of the organisation along Trades Union lines, or into protective association of kinema workers. Some time ago the idea of a kinema artistes society was mooted and more recently the Variety Artistes' Federation and the Actors' Association held joint meetings to discuss the organisation of "kinemartists." Now I understand that a scheme is afoot to develop a new organisation for workers of the kinema.

I cannot help feeling that this multiplication of trade unions or approved societies is futile. The aims of those who wish to safeguard the interest of the screen artiste should, I feel, be to avoid unnecessary overhead charges and to enlist the maximum of sympathy and assistance. The cost of premises and staff salaries these days are so high that it would seem better for the kinema folk to avail themselves, as many are doing, of the efficient help of organisations already set up. Thus, too, they would have the backing of a larger body, which is "a very present help in time of trouble."

The Actors' Association has fought and won many cases for kinema actors and actresses, for whose protection it has an effective machinery already set and operating. On the Council are several prominent screen players who know as much of the difficulties and are as jealous of the repute of the film-world as any one in this country. The A.A. welcomes movie actors and can watch their interests and organise contracts and working conditions as well as any body which may be set up in the future. We would urge those who think of setting up any other organisation to think again. Second thoughts, notoriously the best, will probably cause them to throw in their lot with the Association which has already done so much for film folk.

I have no doubt that, if it is felt that a special branch is necessary to deal with the special needs of the picture-player, the A.A. would sympathetically consider such policy. But while a live and soundly functionary organisation is in the field, I cannot acquiesce in the setting up of a second organisation with a similar objective.

CROWD WORK

by E. ALBURY

She was possessed of but one ambition since she had become a picture devotee, to the entire elimination of everything else in life, and although she was blessed with what can only be termed an old-woman character face, she argued that having seen many such types on the screen, she would also try her hand at becoming a movie artiste, and tempt fame and fortune, and, perhaps—who knows?—attain stellar rank.

That she was exceedingly plain, of uncertain age, but tired of being a cook-house-keeper, mattered not; she would try, or die in the attempt.

After writing numerous letters and making many inquiries, she was made aware of the fact that she would have to start at the bottom of the ladder, and "walk on" in a crowd.

Eventually she succeeded in coming face to face with a director. Advancing coyly, with a giggle she asked if he was wanting any crowds.

Taking a hurried glance at the ambitious one the Director politely answered, "Not any crowds, but I have just sent a small party through that door, and if you will hurry I daresay you will catch up with it."

ACTING ON STAGE AND SCREEN

by Ernest Hendrie (Author of "The Elder Miss Blossom")

It is an open question whether, ipso facto, the actor of the theatre possesses qualifications which will serve him when he turns his attention to the film, but it is at least a certainty that were he to rely solely upon the method of the theatre his work in this direction would be valueless.

His success must depend upon his adaptability. In no art can there be hard and fast laws, and to dogmatise is futile; everything depends, when all is said and done, upon individuality.

Hitherto he has been called upon for the exercise of craftsmanship—technique—to gain the attention and win the sympathies of his audience. He has had to get in touch with it as a whole, drawing it to him his work proceeds, and, by a most subtle and indescribable sense, he can tell (if he indeed be an actor) whether his work is "getting over" or not without the overt indication of applause.

How is it with him when he stands before the camera? He is surely prone to miss that moving sense of touch to which he has been used, but he has in the mechanism before him so quick and ready a sympathy, so tender and sure a response, that it must be his first care to re-establish it.

He may not look at the recording lens, nor should he indeed have been in the habit of looking at his audience, but between him and the camera must quickly spring into being an even more subtle and indescribable sympathy. Let him remember that the camera misses nothing; he has its absolute attention, he has never to strive to gain it. And let him use to the full that control of gesture and expression, the most difficult attainment of the actor's art—repose—and the experience of the theatre should stand the actor in good stead.

The system of the theatre is totally at variance with that employed in film work. The actor has time at rehearsals for his ideas of a part to develop gradually, and to mature. In this process the relation of his part to the play is carefully thought out, and its emphasis studied and decided upon, the weight of each scene registered and determined with far greater deliberation than that employed in film work.

At a first performance in a theatre the actor reaches his climax by the elaboration of thought and action preceding it, whereas in film work he may be called upon to portray his climax first from sheer expediency.

Again, the film actor can never grow to his effect by the nervous promptings of the theatre, because his work is always sectional, and he starts upon those sections cold.

It may be argued that an actor can play the big scene of a play independently of the whole; it frequently happens that he does so, but seldom, if ever, would an actor attempt such an experiment for his first essay in a part.

In filming it is always a first essay. What actor is there who, on seeing his work on the screen, has not had the wish that he might do it all again with the finish which familiarity would bring.

There is indeed much for the actor to learn and unlearn before he can attain the control of himself necessary for any degree of perfection in this most difficult and fascinating art.

Above all things, he must take the work seriously, and appreciate its immense possibilities and bear in mind the limits of those possibilities. An assured reliance on his popularity and distinction in his own field of art is fatal.

I have spoken of repose as a great asset of the film actor. Sometimes I am led to think that individuals have attained a measure of success by their very incompetence of gesture; by this I do not mean they have used incorrect gesture with effect, but by not having gesture at their command have appeared reposeful from their very inability.

Speaking as a unit of the picture-loving audience, it seems to me that many a director is lacking in repose. Is not the work one sees frequently too kaleidoscopic, too restless, too difficult for the eye to follow with ease and pleasure? Is not the continuity of action too often hindered by little retrospective insistences, by too frequent a change in location and action which is consequently too confused and complex?

In a large number of pictures I have witnessed there is, to my mind, a sense of hurry, an unnecessary effort to get on, an obvious fear of those restful moments, the value of which can hardly be estimated as help to brain and eye; some beautiful landscape is flashed upon the screen and withdrawn before its details can possibly be absorbed and appreciated. By all means get on, but not so quickly as to cause irritation. Show the picture or cut it right out, have the courage of a conviction, and by all means have a conviction. This is a necessity in every art.

The work of a director cannot for a moment be compared with that of his confrère of the theatre, but I am inclined to believe the theatre producer, especially if he be an actor, should find, once he had mastered the necessary technique of the film, an unlimited field for his abilities.

A BRITISH SCREEN VENUS

The lost arms of Venus have been found! For some time now America has been boasting the possession of a screen Venus, but now it is our turn. The British screen possesses an actress whose form and figure is an exact replica of Venus de Milo.

Moirá Verney Warwickshire born and bred, comes of mixed parentage having English, Scottish and Irish blood in her veins. She is a descendant of Sir Roderick Murchison, founder and first President of the Royal Geographical Society.

Miss Verney, after her education was finished, was trained for the career of a professional singer, and possesses a fine soprano voice.

After singing at all the big concerts, she turned her attention to the screen, when it was discovered that she had the exact measurements of Venus, viz. :—

	Inches
Head	21½
Neck	12½
Bust	33
Hips	38
Waist	26
Ankle	8
Height	64
	(5 ft. 4 in.)

Being an expert horsewoman as well as well-known for her ballet and Oriental dancing, Miss Verney soon found a place for herself in photoplays, and her work has included F. P. Lasky, Gaumont, Masters, Phillips and Pathé.

SCHOOLS AND THEIR PUPILS

Second Article :—No Market for Students

THE article published in our last issue on the question of so-called kinema schools has brought us numerous replies and visits. Owing to extreme pressure on our space it must suffice if this week some of the letters from producing companies are published together with a letter from John Payne, of Bramlin's, advocating the establishment of a reputable college.

Bert Wynne, now directing for Seal, writes:—

"Personally, since directing, I have absolutely refused to engage in my productions students from kinema schools, and shall continue to do so. In my opinion, kinema schools should be abolished without exception."

W. Bruce Hacking, of Fleet Photoplays, writes:—

"We do not employ students straight from the kinema schools; we should refuse to employ students straight from the kinema schools, and the possession of kinema schools training carries no weight whatsoever with us."

F. A. Kendrick writes from the Ideal Studios:—

"The question of a student having come straight from a kinema school does not influence us one way or the other, as we never trouble to inquire."

Francis Rushmore, studio manager to Raleigh King, writes to say that that firm does not employ students straight from kinema schools, but the possession of kinema school training does not preclude artistes from working for the firm. He adds that he is not in favour of such schools.

Bernard Bromhead says that Gaumont refuses to employ students straight from kinema schools, and adds, "It would be manifestly unfair for the artiste to be for ever barred from obtaining work at the studio because of his having been trained at a kinema school, but it is always explained that kinema school training is detrimental and not helpful to the success of the artiste. Furthermore, many artistes are engaged who for obvious reasons do not mention that they were ever at a kinema school."

Major C. H. Bell writes from the F.P.-Lasky studio to say that students direct from the schools are not engaged at that studio. "We are of opinion," he says, "that these schools are a general nuisance to the trade. They are used chiefly by the screen-struck and only tend to raise false hopes in these people who, after taking a course of training, go round to the studios to worry directors, and in most cases volunteer the information that they have been sent down from the school with the idea that they will be able immediately to secure an engagement. In many cases they are offended when informed that their course of training does not materially assist them to this end."

From Screenplays E. E. Pilgrim writes:—

"We refuse to employ artistes straight from kinema schools because we feel that it is impossible to teach the art of acting in a few short lessons."

Bertram Phillips says: "I refuse to employ kinema school students and the possession of kinema school training precludes artistes from working for me. All applications received from would-be screen artistes who have been trained by these concerns are answered by the plain statement that we refuse to recognise introductions from any such source."

Joe Grosman, Stoll's studio manager, writes to say that Stoll refuses to engage students straight from kinema schools, and when applications are made by persons desirous of obtaining crowd work the possession of a kinema school certificate does not exclude them from receiving equal consideration with other applicants.

Felix Orman writes on behalf of J. Stuart Blackton: "We cast artistes only on their merits. We know very little of kinema schools, and personally I have little faith in them."

These letters—only a few from a mass of correspondence—only serve to show that, so far as the market for film artistes is concerned, kinema school students are not welcomed, and, in fact, are handicapped by being students of schools.

John Payne writes:—

I note with great interest that you are taking up the matter of schools for film acting, but there is undoubtedly room for a properly run college.

For this reason:—It is well known that every director, casting director, agent—indeed everybody connected with the film production side—is on the look-out for new talent, especially among juveniles.

Now, it is undoubtedly a fact that, so far as the stage is concerned, before any juvenile man or girl gets anything like a show, he or she has to go through a pretty stiff training in the provinces in order to learn that much-despised thing called "technique."

The opportunities for learning this in the film business is practically nil, owing to the fact that there are not a sufficiency of productions going and the general lack of stock companies and other reasons I will not go into.

I have often heard it said that all that is necessary is for a person to be natural, forgetting that art lies in the ability to appear natural. Actually, to acquire the art of being natural on the film or stage requires intense study, and is hardly ever a gift. The stage actor has by several years' experience learnt to walk, to open letters, newspapers, to take a cigarette case out of his pocket and light a cigarette so that none of his actions should appear confused from a distance. And the same remarks apply to the actress in the many things she is called upon to do. If these various small actions are done naturally, the result on the screen and the result on the stage from a distance is a clumsy movement that looks like nothing.

Again, there are stronger effects to be obtained. Watch the experienced actress or actor get over a certain dramatic situation. It all seems to come so simply and so expressively, whereas the man or woman with no dramatic experience—their feelings may be as intense as the experienced artiste—on the screen or stage have lost all dramatic value by the apparent blundering of their actions.

How can our younger members on the films and members without any stage experience, who yet have a great capacity for dramatic power, obtain this necessary and essential technique to enable them to express what they want to do on the screen except by learning, and where can they learn but at a dramatic college.

The process of learning would be tedious to the last degree, but if the film aspirant took up a proper course, such as is done at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, those who were not keen would soon drop out, whereas those who were sincere would stick it and learn their business.

To-day, if a girl is pretty and intelligent, or a man or boy is good-looking, he or she as often as not jumps into a lead at once. They seldom make good because always they are just not quite right.

Having so successfully launched the Kinema Club, the next thing for those interested in the kinema business is to start an authorised Kinema College, and that would do away with many abuses.

Getting the Focus

Wasted Unanimity.

IT seems astounding that while there is a general recognition of one of the weak spots of film productions there is no general attempt to strengthen this. There may be a diversity of opinion on the quality of acting and the absence of directorial ability or the excellence of the photography of British films, but there is no difference of opinion on the question of the literary aspect of productions. On every hand people who know are saying that the story is the thing that is of transcendental importance ; that the art of the scenarist has not reached the same level as that of the photographer ; that much of the defective quality of films is directly traceable to the story. And yet in the face of this unanimity there is an apparent diffidence emphatically to deal with the subject.

* * *

Indiscretions of Youth.

OF course, with scenario writing as with every other aspect of film producing in his country we are suffering from the growing pains of youth. And the immaturity of youth. And the inexperience of youth. And the reckless irresponsibility of youth. For the fact is as clear as crystal that very few skilled penmen and women have taken the art of film scenario writing seriously. No doubt the reason is that it has not been made worth their while. This is the basis of the argument put forward by Sidney Morgan in his series of three informative articles which we are printing. Mr. Morgan speaks with authority, he being an experienced director and a skilful scenarist. And he seems to have proved his case on the question of the relative expenditure associated with a film. This is to the effect that while producing companies boast of spending £10,000 on a production only a hundredth part of this goes to the scenarist.

* * *

Worn-out Novels.

WITHOUT wishing to reopen the eternal debate on "Novels or Original Scenarios," it is only right to support Jeffrey Bernerd in his views that it is now time for well-established novelists to write direct for the screen. Some of these gentlemen have made fortunes out of good sellers; raked in fresh thousands for serial rights; then more thousands for the novel to be dramatised, and finally sell this worn-out story to a film firm for anything up to £3,000, which is not half as bad business for the novelist as for the film firm, who are now within their rights in scrapping the policy of buying the film rights of worn-out stories and expecting these novelists of standing to write new and original stuff for screening. For it must be remembered that very few—if any—novels are suitable for filming without so much adapting that they almost lose their original identity.

Q Despite all you think to the contrary, there is a law of the universe which ordains that the paying policy is the clean straight, upright way of living and working.

It is easy to think that this is not so, especially when you see crooks coining cash and rogues raking in riches. But no one has yet proved that, ultimately, honesty is not the best policy. It pays to be straight—and the payment is in currency that is of far more value than coin of the realm; straight dealing is rewarded by an intact self-respect.

¶ Take out plenty of shares in the Syndicate of Straightforwardness, you will reap ample dividends.

Mental Astigmatism.

IN this country we have plenty of struggling photo playwrights who are mentally, socially and technically able to turn out infinitely better screenable stuff than knighted novelists. But the demand is set in favour of the knighted novelist at present and the reason given is that his name will "draw." Which is, if our film magnates did not suffer from acute mental astigmatism, they would have seen long ago is damaging to the interests of the Industry.

The public may be attracted by the author's name, but when it pays its ninepence and sees a poor imitation of the original book it gets badly fed-up with film entertainment altogether. And possibly, this bad imitation is due to the fact that the mammoth sum paid to the author is at the expense of the working costs of the production.

The Scenarists' Charter.

COMMERCIALISM should not, of course, invade the precincts of art, but the creative artist must not be forced to labour without the stimuli of financial returns and elevated professional reputation. Even at the best the scenarist has to toil on without the artistic momentum that fires the imagination and spurs his efforts. The taint of commercialism has long since infected the seven arts and so no apology is needed for attempting to construe the art of the scenarist into terms of legal tender. And we are forced to the conclusion that the only hope for the scenarist as for the screen actor, is an amalgamation of effort. Screen artistes need a protective Federation to safeguard their interests; scenarists need a Magna Charter to defend and guarantee their privileges and their rights. A standard contract will help solve the artiste's troubles; a Photoplay Charter will help the scenarist. When this is effected, then the photoplaywright will not experience the shock of seeing his well-balanced story made into a freak film and ruined by the asinine intrusion of stubborn upstarts and chronic imbeciles.

Losing Friends.

THERE was some regrettable hot-air exhaled at the Lyceum Club dinner last night and it is to be deplored that our profession is taking such an unconscionable time to get past the stage of childishness that is evidenced by washing dirty linen in public. We had the spectacle of the head of a film producing firm taking one of his staff to task and refuting his arguments by assertions that, in view of the circumstances of their associations, came perilously near personalities. Even if the castigation was deserved (and having regard to the function and the numerous British artistes present we think it was if only as a condemnation of bad taste) we tremble for the future of the Industry if these scenes are going to be repeated year after year.

ADAPTATIONS ON TRIAL

by WALTER REYNOLDS, Jun,

SIDNEY MORGAN, in the March 18 issue, succeeds admirably in demonstrating how discouraging is the position of the scenarist. It is a lamentable fact that, although film artistes and directors have acquired fame greater than that accorded to the giants of other artistic professions, in no single case has a kinedramatist been able to get to the public in such a way as to gain the notoriety of the average good utility actor.

In view of the fact that some new and more satisfactory way of attracting the public has got to be found the causes for this unfortunate position deserve close analysis.

The principal reason why the kinedramatist is held so cheaply is the craze for adaptation of novels and plays. Commercially, for a time, this idea proved a financial gold mine, and it was only necessary to get some studio hack to turn the incidents into a faint resemblance of the original plot and the notoriety of the subject carried the film through. After paying, let us say, £1,000, for the film rights of a notorious success some manufacturers begrudged £50 or even £25 for the work of the scenarist.

The crimes that have been committed in the name of adaptation are sufficient to cause eternal agitation of the souls of nearly all the classic authors, and would merit nothing less than capital punishment for the perpetrators if there were such a tribunal as a Court of Literary Justice.

The only verdict that can carry any impression is that of public opinion. This is already being felt and manufacturers will soon realise that if they wish to convey to the screen the charm and spirit that made the success of the original story they will have to get the services not of a hack plot-monger, but of an artist; one who can visualise the story in the spirit in which it was first conceived and translate the soul of it, as well as the plot, into terms of motion pictures.

The work of such an adapter is almost as important as that of the creator of the story, and although there are, even now, firms which will pay as much as £250 for such work, the time is bound to come when the remuneration will reach even a higher standard. Had it not been for the adapting craze the screen author would to-day have reached an honoured and well paid position among the professions.

Another cause that has overshadowed the position of the kinedramatist is the power and importance allocated to the director. The director has nearly all the responsibility and he can make or mar a picture, so when a director turns out a consistent average of good pictures it is only just that he should receive the lion's share of the publicity and applause. But—and it is some but—when a director is purely a technician—when, for example, he graduated in the school of slap-stick comedy or crude melodrama and should never have been entrusted with anything else—ought he to be “chaired” and “draped with laurels” in the prevailing fashion?

What are the relative positions of the kinedramatist who has created an original story and the director? Usually, the kinedramatist has to “bite his nails” outside the studio door while the director does what the blue blazes he thinks fit with the work that the other man has brought forth, perhaps in sore travail: or, at best he has to witness the tortured mutilation of the child of his brain.

Should not the first test of a director's ability be his knowledge of whether a continuity is right or wrong, good, bad, or indifferent? If it is right and good he ought to be satisfied to go through with it as written (subject, of course, to the insertion of close-ups and the dividing scenes into different shots), but if he thinks it is wrong and bad he should not, in his own or his firm's interests, proceed with it until the scenarist has revised his work or he, the director, has given his reasons for protesting against handling it as it stands.

A competent kinedramatist should be soaked in studio technique, and when he hands over his continuity it should, amongst other things, cover the approximate length of film required. Why, then, should it be necessary for a director to use up 30,000 to 40,000 feet of film in making a six-reeler? The stories of super-directors who use up 300,000 feet of negative in accomplishing a similar purpose are good enough for the Americans and the Horse-Marines.

It is poor business reasoning to expect capitalists to finance production enterprises while unsatisfactory films are being turned out, and surely the root trouble must lie either with the scenarist or the director. If the scenarist is at fault need we look far for the reason? No complaints are heard that the director is anything but well paid, whereas it appears to be notorious that the kinedramatist is a nonentity who is neither adequately recognised nor well paid.

The future prosperity of the industry rests with the directors and scenarists, and probably more with the latter than the former.

The screen requires men who combine technical ability with creative power; who can grasp an idea in its fullest significance and then give full play to their own personality as they transform it into a screen play which should have as its chief constituent that human atmosphere which makes the success of 99 stories out of a 100.

Mr. Morgan looks to the time when only stories that are worth £1,000 shall be produced. I look to the time when screen authors, like their other brethren of the pen, shall be paid on a royalty basis. I had it on reliable authority that a certain author received 25 per cent. on gross receipts for dramatic rights of a well known play. His revenue from this one play probably exceeded £100,000. Well—we have super-actors and super-directors who cover more than this annually. Why not super-authors?

In any case we have, all of us, got to “deliver the goods” unless the moving pictures are to return to the gutter appreciation of the penny gaff.

APRIL FIRST!

And our front cover is adorned with the photograph of that inimitable practical joker, Malcolm Tod, who is a well-known figure in the film producing profession and an enthusiastic member of the Kinema Club.

It was just about a year ago that he first entered the business, and since then he has rapidly come to the fore as a juvenile lead, of no mean ability. During his professional career he has played with Masters, Progress, F.P.-Lasky, Davidson, and Stoll. He has just completed work with Davidson, for whom he played the Bachelor in “A Bachelor's Baby.” This picture is to be trade shown in June. He is now busy with Stoll, playing opposite Ivo Close, in “Expiation,” which Sinclair Hill is directing.

Tod has to his credit a distinguished war record. He entered the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, in 1915, and was then gazetted to the Black Watch. He served in the first battalion on the Somme in 1916. In 1917 he was seconded at his own request to the Royal Flying Corps, and saw six months' service in No. 20 (Fighting) Squadron.

During this time he experienced many thrilling adventures, which include over thirty aerial fights, of which eight were decisive. He also carried out the first successful night-bombing raid made by his squadron on a German aerodrome. He was twice shot down by German anti-aircraft guns, but on each occasion was lucky enough to land in the British lines.

After such adventures as these, he was sent home and became technical instructor on the Bombing Staff at Reading and Uxbridge, receiving his Captaincy in 1918. In 1919 he rejoined his regiment and proceeded with the 2nd Battalion to the Army of Occupation on the Rhine. Finding peace-time soldiering too monotonous, he resigned his commission a year ago, and we now find him well on the way to screen stardom.

He is an all-round athlete and there are few sports he has not taken up. His measurements are practically identical with Carpentier's. His hobbies are sailing, motoring, dancing and practical joking, which no doubt accounts for his having waited till the first of April before making his debut on our front cover.

PASSED

“The Passionate Friends” (Stoll), “A.”

“The Recoil” (Hardy), “A.”

“Simple Simon” (Hepworth), “U.”

NOTE: Those marked “U” are for universal exhibition; “A” are recommended for adults only.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Am awfully glad to welcome back to British studios that clever and beautiful British artiste, Ivy Close. It is now several months since Miss Close went on the Continent, and she has been doing excellent work in French studios and played lead in "Rose of the Road," which Abel Gance (of "J'Accuse" fame) directed. She is now at Stoll Studio playing a leading part for Sinclair Hill in "Expiation."

* * *

Whenever I go to a studio I am always lost in admiration of the exquisite patience of the artistes who stand about for possibly two hours waiting for the director to arrange the sets, etc. David Grey has turned the waits to profit. In between shots he thought out a little commercial gadget which is selling like ice-cream in Hades to picture fans. This is a natty little file-book, each loose-leaf page being devoted to a film, and the fan thus has a method of recording the various films shown at the favourite cinema. Spaces are left for entries of the names of the director, author and cast. Altogether it is a capital idea, and Dick assures me that he has now ordered his fourth Rolls-Royce as a result.

* * *

At the Lyceum Club dinner (reported elsewhere) I had a chat with George K. Arthur and learned that he is about to head his own producing company. A syndicate of four well-known people in the film world has been formed under the name of George K. Arthur Productions. The personnel of this syndicate is George K. Arthur, Flora Le Breton, Edward R. Gordon and a gentleman very prominently connected with one of the largest American renting concerns. The three chief artistes are George K., Miss Le Breton and Doris Lloyd, with Edward R. Gordon as director of productions. The first picture is being started on this week—a five-reel comedy drama, mainly exteriors.

* * *

I sat between Florence Turner and Gertrude McCoy at the Lyceum dinner, and became hopelessly bewildered in the cross-fire of brilliant comments from two sweet scintillating ladies from the other side. Miss Turner is still chuckling over an incident which occurred at the Stoll Picture Theatre Club last week. Miss

Turner had just concluded her lecture and invited the audience to ask her any question they desired. Fred Wright uncoiled himself from a corner seat and said: "Although I know the answer to my question I should be glad if Miss Turner would give me permission to ask it." On receiving permission the inimitable Fred said: "I want to ask Miss Turner if she will marry me!" (Collapse of Miss Turner, shrieks of laughter from the house and unperturbable Fred standing waiting for the devastating reply, which Miss Turner was too prostrate with laughter to give.) Heaven only knows what Fred will say or do next. But I would like to know what was the substance of the whispered conversation between Miss Turner and Fred immediately after this sensational proposal.

* * *

Bryan Powley, who, before he left on a Canadian tour with Marie Lohr, was a familiar figure in British films, is now back in London again and will play a leading part in "Mr. Studley Revokes," which opens to-morrow at the King's Hall, Covent Garden, by the Interlude Players. Powley hopes to be at work again in a new British film before long, but hopes that he will not repeat an experience he had whilst making a war film. He, with some other actors, were hiding (attired as Germans) under a pile of hay. As arranged, the hay was fired by a shell, but owing to the fact that other members of the German Army were standing well and firmly on his legs, Powley was unable to get away in time—his face and hands were badly burned, and he was disfigured for several weeks.

* * *

The new Raleigh King film, entitled "Creation," is now progressing rapidly, and it is hoped that within the next few weeks it will be completed. Produced by Humberstone Wright, the cast includes Dorothy Fane, Frank Dane, Sir Simeon Stuart, Thelma Murray, Raleigh King and Beryl Norton. Full advantage is being taken of the wonderful scenery to be found near the studio, and the wedding scene is set at one of the oldest churches in the district. During the filming of some of the scenes, Dorothy Fane, who is playing the leading part of Zena, narrowly escaped a serious accident. In the middle of one of the most dramatic scenes one of the overhead lights became detached from its position and fell with a crash at Miss Fane's side, fortunately missing her head. Studio hands immediately ran to the rescue before serious damage was done. Although Miss Fane suffered from shock, she bravely carried on.

* * *

Thelma Murray writes me a chatty letter all about life in Torquay, where she is playing the part of Angel Lovell in "Creation," the new Raleigh King production. This is her fourth lead, after having played numerous parts with Samuelson, Gaumont and British Actors. "This is more or less a vamp part," she writes, "and there is plenty of scope for good acting, which one ought to be able to do admirably under the directorship of Humberstone Wright, who is so capable, and above all so patient and kind." In conclusion she mentions that she will be down at Torquay for about a month, but hopes to find time to get up to town for the Kinema Club Carnival.

SCENARIO WRITING

A Poem written by Kenneth Easton.

A MAN called Clement Arthur wrote a super photo-play.
He called it "Night's o' London" or "Why does the Woman Pay"?
There were scenes staged in Morocco and as far as Zanzibar,
And he filled it full of villains and a "milk and water" star.

He took it to a company who advertised for plots;
And though it wasn't typewritten but full of inky blots.
The proud director read it and he said without a grin,
"There isn't any plot, but—it's just the very thing."

And then he told the author that the stunts were very tame,
But thought that he'd accept it as he rather liked the name;
And he told the joyful author to call around at dawn,
For he'd no cash upon him and—his account was overdrawn.

The Director was the kind of man who couldn't play the game,*
So he changed the blinking title; also the author's name,
(He thought his own name would look nice upon the title sheet),
And he pushed in half-a-dozen scenes to make a thousand feet.

But when poor Clement donned his hat and called around next day,
He gnashed his teeth to find the man had packed and gone away;
And as he paced the pavement, grinding his teeth in grief,
He vowed he would have vengeance on that low down picture thief.

When Clement saw his story he swore he'd ne'er be seen.
Writing super picture plays for other folks to screen;
And when he saw the fillum—well, it nearly broke his heart,
And he vowed that the darned Kinema would never be an art.

And now, dear reader, if you aspire to be a film playwright,
You all know, now, its trials and the men you'll have to fight;
But if you've got some brains and know just what to do,
Well I think I'm right in saying that there may be room for you.

**Practically the only one of its kind in existence in this country.*

BRITISH FILMS ABROAD

by CHRISTABEL LOWNDES-YATES and MURIEL ALLEYNE

FROM all parts of the Empire comes the cry that they want British films. This gives the British scenarists their great chance.

Firstly, British pictures might be said to be characterised by simplicity and homeliness. This type of film is exemplified by the films of such firms as Hepworth and George Clark, and the work of J. Stuart Blackton and A. E. Coleby.

Beautiful English scenery is a great feature of most of these pictures, and in each case the story appears stripped of almost all artificiality. Added to this and perhaps accentuating it, is the natural simplicity of the English settings. The elaborate and over-ornamented studio scenes of American productions give place to the homely type of English rooms, and it is just this homeliness that is the great unrealised asset of English pictures.

We say "unrealised" advisedly. One often hears unthinking people, who are out of touch with the great public that they are catering for, speak as if the American picture was a uniform style to be attained at any cost. It is not. It is when England dares to be herself that she forges ahead in trade, and in all her most successful enterprises it is the other nations who try to copy her.

No one who knows the nauseating tendency of too many pictures turned out all on one pattern, could fail to realise this. The picture-loving public does not patronise the kinemas merely to see the same old pictures, the same old ideas, and the same old situations, worked to death, while only the name of the film is changed. The pictures that have made money, and the pictures that have made fame, have not been crude copies, they have been original works of art. They have followed no set plan, but they have been truly national, not aping the work of any other nation, but portraying life as it is seen through the medium of its own national ideals.

All over the Empire men and women—homesick for a sight of English things—are asking us to send them English films. English stories with English settings, modern stories that shall show these far-away exiles how we are living at home, and how things are going with us. Stories that will be real stories, tales of everyday life in this modern upside-down world that only seems ordinary to us because we have forgotten pre-war days.

That is the chance for the British scenarist, and that, too, is the chance for the producing firm which wants to make big money. A simple strong story, an original story, is what the ordinary public wants. The greatest films of the future will not be books, they will be original plays, but they will be plays that will have the essentially English tradition. They will have clean morals, beautiful settings, and a happy issue. Such films will, by their very national feeling, go all over the world wherever the British flag flies. Canada, India, Australia, Egypt, South Africa, New Zealand, and all the other scattered places of the Empire will welcome them. That is the field where the scenarist will find fame, and the director fortune.

PREPARING THE SCRIPT

In the chapters on "The Scenario" in his book, "Kinematograph Studio Technique,"* L. C. MacBean gives some advice which should be of immense value to those interested in the art of scenario writing. He says:—

The time when it was deemed sufficient to supply a theme or outline a plot is now long past. Whilst the essence of a story or adaptation in short synopsis form is undoubtedly useful and even imperative as a preface to the scenario—inasmuch as it assists the busy man to whom it is submitted quickly to grasp the situation and pick out the "telling" features—the real issue lies in the well-constructed and visualised series of scenes and actions which go to make the finished scenario.

It is usual then to preface the scenario with a short, pithy synopsis, setting down in few words the main points of the story. The scenario proper should consist of a description of all the separate scene-actions, full but concise; each numbered consecutively; preferably using quarto paper, neatly typed and allowing one sheet to each scene. The pages should be headed with the number of the scene and a description of the background, and may possibly bear a list of characters taking part in the scheme, the season and time of day, and the colour which the resultant film should be tinted or toned. Due regard must be paid to the length of each scene—some experienced writers lay down the approximate footage (or length) in order to estimate the total length of the film. As the longest roll of negative film measures about 400 ft. and as (roughly) 1 ft. passes through the camera in a second, the scene should not exceed 4 or 5 min. in duration. It is unusual, however, to allow so long a time for one scene, unless it be punctuated, or the continuity broken, by the insertion of some wording, a change of view, or a flash of some other scene.

Prior to the actual work of production, lists of scenes, sets, costumes or changes of dress, and special furniture or necessary properties should be prepared. These lists should be combined or arranged in some form that will give the producer and staff clear and concise information for dealing with the various operations both preparatory to and during the actual production. This analysis is simply a dissection of the plot and a summary of the necessary details, designed to facilitate the preparatory and actual work of producing and photographing the scenes eliminating the possibility of any omission and reducing to a minimum the necessity for referring to the scenario.

Perhaps the best method of arranging the analysis is to allow a separate sheet for each interior scene or exterior location, numbered from 1 upwards and from 51 upwards respectively.

The sheets, which are preferably on printed forms, contain—

A list of characters required in the particular set or location;

The scene numbers as per the scenario;

The dress to be worn by artistes in each scene;

A list of special furniture;

A list of special properties;

Other particulars and technical details.

SCRIBES OF THE SCREEN

AS yet there is not a great army of scenarists, and what scenarists there are do not seek the publicity they deserve. Below will be found some particulars of a few.

HELEN BLIZZARD

Born in Manchester, played 1916, under stage-name, small parts in various films. Assistant director to M. Leigh, of Gaumont's; assistant editor to Langford Reed, of Barker's; assistant editor to The London Film for a year, then Master's under contract as scenario and synopsis writer. Now preparing own "originals." C/o. 378, Grove Green Road, Leytonstone.

She has adapted the following books for the screen:—"The Key of the World," "Sister Anne," "The Broken Thread," "Perpetua," "The Lord of Latimer Street."

KATE GURNEY

It was so far back as in 1915 that Miss Gurney commenced her screen work. Since that time she has written scenarios for Nordisk, Essanay, and Hepworth. She wrote the script of "Solomon's Twins" (Everyman), "The Manxman" (London), "The Gay Lord Quex" (Ideal), "Comradeship," "The Swindler," "Mr. Wu," and "At the Villa Rose," for Stoll. She also art-directed "Sword of Fate" for Screenplays. Address: 8, Moor Street, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

ELIOT STANNARD

First scenario, "The Bells of Rheims," produced 1914. Remained for over two years on the staff of the B. and C. Film Co. as actor, director and scenarist. Became a freelance scenarist in 1916, and has since adapted for the screen works by John Galsworthy, J. M. Barrie, John Strange Winter, Hall Caine, Robert Hichens, the Baroness Orczy, Stanley Houghton, William Le Queux, I. Zangwill, F. H. Maltby, Walter Howard, Roy Horniman, Harold Terry, etc. Also a number of original screen plays, and film versions of classics by Dickens, Fielding, Buchanan, Lytton, and Emily Brontë. Latest releases "The Bachelors' Club" and "The Old Country." Author of a number of technical articles on Kinematography, and a member of the kinema sub-committee of The Incorporated Society of Authors.

HARRY HUGHES

First joined Pathé in 1907. He was General Manager of the Kinematograph Trading Company in 1912; Managing Director of Lloyd's Film Agency in 1914; conducted the publicity campaign in connection with "The Birth of a Nation" at the Scala; organised the Publicity Sales Department of Triangle Plays. After demobilisation in 1919, he turned his attention solely to film editing, and it was this work that led him to study the technique of the screen play. The first British Art Film—"The Shadow of Evil"—was an adaptation from his pen; he is also responsible for the adaptation of "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," for which Pina Menichelli recently visited London to complete certain scenes.

WILLIAM J. ELLIOTT

So far back as eleven years ago Mr. Elliott introduced himself to the film world when he played for the old London Films. This was followed by appearances for Hepworth, Clarendon, Cricks and Martin, during which time he thoroughly mastered all the technique of the studio. Then he became a scenarist, and also edited Photo Playwright. He is also the author of How to Become a Film Actor. Since the war he has devoted himself entirely to writing scenarios, his most recent subjects including "Bleak House," "Colonel Newcome," "The Ever Open Door," "Beyond Dreams of Avarice," "The Channings," "Innocent," "A Gentleman of France," etc. Address:—Ashley Warren, Oatlands Chase, Walton-on-Thames.

ALICIA RAMSEY

Alicia Ramsey, who has written the version of "Rob Roy" on which Gaumont is at work, has only recently returned home from New York, where she made a name for herself by her original stories written for the screen.

Before going to America, however, Miss Ramsey had attained a reputation as a dramatist, novelist, and short story writer. Several of her plays were produced at West End theatres, while, perhaps, her greatest play, "Byron," which may shortly be seen, was secured by the late Lewis Waller, whose untimely death prevented his appearance in the name part.

ARTHUR SHIRLEY

Mr. Shirley is a dramatist and scenarist of established repute. The following film stories are to his credit:—"Sixty Years a Queen" (Samuelson), "My Old Dutch" (Ideal), "Going the Pace" (Maurice Tourneur), "Saved from the Sea" (Gaumont), "Woman and Wine" (World), and many others. His address is c.o. the Lyceum Theatre.

"My Old Dutch" was first issued in 1916, and after more than one reissue was still being shown in 1921. Several new scenarios now completed.

CYRIL E. MURRELL

Mr. Murrell, who has been connected with the producing side of the trade since early in 1919, is one of our youngest scenarists, and in this comparatively short length of time quite an appreciable number of his original stories have been produced. He is also engaged by Aerofilms, and is often in the air with a camera for them. Mr. Murrell is preparing scenarios, and has turned his attention to all humorous subjects for the film. He is now busy writing original scenarios for drawing-room comedies, light farcical plays of a "stage" nature, and seaside stories of bathing girls. Several very special scripts for a series of two-reel super-comedies are in the hands of one director. Mr. Murrell's address is 1, Pine Road, Cricklewood, N.W.2.

S. H. HERKOMER

Is the eldest son of the late Sir Hubert Herkomer, born at Bushey in 1874, educated at Harrow, and has had a varied career, which has provided experience peculiarly useful to the scenarist. As a boy he acted important parts in the operas and plays produced by his father in his private theatre at Bushey.

But the death of Sir Hubert and the outbreak of war brought to a conclusion the career of the Herkomer Film Co., not until some important films had been produced, the last of which was "A Highwayman's Honour." He produced "All the Sad World Needs" for British Actors, and later worked in collaboration with Kenelm Foss for Lucky Cat Films. Recently he has specialised as scenarist and film editor, holding the position of scenario editor to British Actors. While with this firm he was responsible for most of the scenarios, and also in several cases assembled and edited the films produced, including "Burnt In," and "The Shuttle of Life."

IRENE MILLER

Miss Miller is a scenario-writer who frankly declares that she is "sick of it all." Originally a journalist, she entered the film world "full of enthusiasm," but is now joyfully drifting back into other kinds of writing. Her short stories are appearing in various ladies' journals; a number of articles on Classical Greece in the Birmingham Weekly Post; whilst Eva Brooke is producing a couple of strong one-act plays from her pen at a forthcoming matinée in aid of St. Dunstan's.

"The past film year has been one of disappointments to me," writes Miss Miller frankly. "I have not sold a single original play, though several times I have been on the verge of so doing. One play has had this experience three times in the year: what's the use of my bothering any more over here?"

Irene Miller was carefully and kindly taught the art of scenario-writing by Captain Will Barker, and was with his company for three years. She has had original plays produced by Captain Barker himself, by Percy Marsh, Bertram Phillips, and Fred Durrant, and has done a considerable number of adaptations for G. B. Samuelson, S. Morgan, and other directors.

KINCHEN WOOD

Mr. Wood writes:—"My first literary effort was a pantomime which ran for a season at Brighton, when I was sixteen and still at College."

"Joined the Naval Air Service in 1914, became Commanding Officer of an Air Station in the Eastern Mediterranean, and am the only surviving holder of all three certificates granted by the Royal Aero Club—Aeroplane, Balloon, and Airship Pilot's."

"After the war published a poetical work, 'The Riddle of Life'; went out to the Hawaiian Islands on a sugar plantation, returned to California, and joined the scenario staff of the Fox Film Co."

"Visited the South Sea Islands, New Zealand, Australia, India, Egypt, Italy and France in order to obtain a knowledge of life and customs in different countries. On returning to England I joined the Stoll Film Co. as a staff scenarist, and have scenarised some of the Sherlock Holmes series and stories by Phillips Oppenheim, A. E. W. Mason, and Ethel M. Dell."

CHRYSTABEL LOWNDES YATES

Miss Yates writes on the films for various papers, and collaborates with Muriel Alleyne in the writing of scenarios. Recent successes include seven films either actually sold or already commissioned. She was Hon. Dramatic Secretary to the Lyceum Club till recently, and read books and plays for a firm with a view to their adaptation for the screen. In addition she has written seven stage plays (all produced) and edited the kinema and stage sections of the Literary Year Book. She has contributed short stories and articles to many of the leading newspapers and magazines in England and America.

MURIEL ALLEYNE

This lady is well known as a free-lance scenarist, and the author of nearly thirty successful screen plays. She has just sold an important six-reel screen play to Riviera Films, Ltd., who has commissioned her to write five others. All these plays are written in collaboration with Miss Lowndes-Yates. They have also sold another six-reel play recently to a well-known director, but as the last is in the nature of a super-film, and the cost involved will be very heavy, the production has been postponed for the present.

GEORGE DEWHURST

George Dewhurst, who for the past two years has been closely associated with Hepworth, has now severed his connection with that firm, and intends, in future, to devote his activities solely to the writing of scenarios and the acting side of the film business.

Dewhurst has been associated with the film business a number of years, and during that time has studied the producing end of the business from every angle. He was responsible for the production of "A Great Coup," for Broadwest, "The Shadow Between," and "The Home Maker."

His scenario work has met with success in the following adaptations: "Her Benny," "The Home Maker," "The Shadow Between," "A Lunatic at Large," "Tansy," "A Sister to Assist 'er," and "Mist in the Valley," whilst examples of his original film stories are "Dollars in Surrey" and "The Narrow Valley," both produced by the Hepworth Company, and "Pipes of Pan."

Dewhurst has appeared in no fewer than seventeen films, the most important of which are, "A Message from Mars," "The Toilers," "Under Suspicion," "A Daughter of Eve," "Snow in the Desert," "The Gentleman Rider," "Helen of Four Gates," "Tansy," "The Narrow Valley," and more recently "The Tinted Venus," and "Wild Heather."

A MIXED MENU

IT speaks well for the esteem in which the profession is held when an institution of the high literary and social attainments of the Lyceum Club annually hold a Film Dinner, to which distinguished members of the profession are invited. Among the gathering on Monday evening were Sir Gilbert Parker, Sir Percy Sykes (Solar Films), Jeffrey Bernerd, George Ridgwell, Donald Crisp, Duncan McRae, Sydney Morgan, Denison Clift, Florence Turner, Gertrude McCoy, Stewart Rome, Marjorie Hume, Joan Morgan, Flora Le Breton, Henry Victor, Malvina Longfellow, Eille Norwood, Fred Groves, Lallie Forsyth, and George K. Arthur.

It was a very delightful evening, and the speeches were not the least enjoyable part of the proceedings. Kitty Willoughby made a charming president.

During the speechifying it was interesting to note that the two most brilliant epigrams came from the representatives of the Stoll organisation. George Ridgwell, in discussing the temperamental folks of the studios said: "In some cases it is plus temper and minus mental." And, later, after several speakers had spoken in more or less glowing terms of Hollywood, Jeffrey Bernerd said: "It is not so important to discuss Hollywood as to discuss Cricklewood."

Sir Gilbert Parker struggled manfully to whitewash the Hollywood folks, and succeeded admirably in keeping well away from his subject: "Authors on the Screen"; his most pointed reference to this was that "it is not imperative for a happy ending to be forced on to every film."

In four years time, Sir Gilbert asserted, the British film would be supreme, and already, he claimed, that the "British actor and actress is the best in the world today." He was so convinced of the national importance of the screen that if he were in charge of the Government he would subsidise the film industry.

No one could help but admire George Ridgwell in delivering a speech that, because of its truth, had to be unpalatable and unpopular. He made no secret of his disagreement with Sir Gilbert's views, and said that, having directed both American and British artistes, he had been forced to the conclusion that the Americans were well ahead of the British in screencraft.

This he attributed to the psychological fact that, whereas the domestic system of American life encouraged the girls to express and exhibit their varying emotions, British girls are taught to repress and suppress real emotion. In this way the capacity for surprise, pleasure, love and other primary emotions was reduced almost to vanishing point.

American girls, like the Latins, were exceedingly temperamental, by which he meant volatile and ready to give way to their feelings readily. But there was an absence of temperament among the British, who were solid and stolid—"excellent for Empire building, but not advantageous to screen acting," he added.

"I have directed both American and British screen artistes, and have always found the former the easier," he said, and proceeded to give as an illustration an artiste he had in America, Alice Mann, whom he put on the floor at a moment's notice to play a very emotional part, which he did not rehearse her through. "And without any trouble she genuinely wept through this part, to the

THE SCENARIO MARKET

In order to assist directors in their efforts to get the right kind of scenario, and scenarists to supply the demand, we have obtained the following particulars of the requirements of the different British producing units.

AEROFILMS

Does not think it advisable to give particulars as producing has been dropped, and it is a waste of time to send scenarios.

ARTISTIC

Scenarios are written by the staff but consideration would always be given to outside work if it is original. Comedy stuff is required for five-reel features. These should be submitted in either synopsis or scenario form and if unsuitable they would be returned. NOTE: Program is complete for the present.

GAUMONT

Gaumont Co. is prepared to accept scenarios from all sources. It especially welcomes stories written primarily for the screen, although adaptations of novels and plays are also considered, provided, of course, the permission of the original authors has already been obtained for making them. In character, stories should be modern in thought, romantic in spirit, with a strong, vital, young, love interest, and should possess that quality which is generally described as "punch." They should be capable of making five or not more than six reels. Stories laid in foreign lands, in imaginary kingdoms, and with ideas which are out of keeping with modern social conditions, are outside the scope of the Company's program, which, for the present, is concentrated on life in the British Isles. Scenarios should be written in story form, with a feeling for "picture values," and with a sense of their logical continuity, but not necessarily in working continuity form. They are not required for any particular star. Manuscripts should be addressed to the Scenario Dept., The Gaumont Co., Ltd., 5-6, Sherwood Street, Piccadilly, W.1.

GRANGER-BINGER

Ready to accept anything good from outside, either originals or adaptations—but these must present real human interest and an international appeal. Scenarios need not be written for any particular player, but must be submitted as a full synopsis, with cast, etc. All scripts should be addressed to the Scenario Editor, 191, Wardour Street, W.1, and MSS. will be returned if unsuitable.

HARDY

Does not accept scenarios from outside; these are especially written by Rafael Sabatini. But Sam Hardy is prepared to consider original stories and synopses which must be addressed to him at 13, Gerrard Street, W.1. (These will be returned if unsuitable, and a stamped addressed envelope must be enclosed for this purpose). Hardy does not specialise in any character of film story and the length of films is five or six reels.

MASTERS

In addition to the staff Masters accepts outside work and at the moment is considering original stories, although adaptations are also considered. No type of story is specialised in and at present one, two and five-reel scripts are required. These need not be written for any particular star. H. B. Parkinson states that prior to scenarios being submitted it is an advantage to see a brief synopsis of the story. MSS. should be addressed to the General Manager of the company, and these are immediately returned if unsuitable.

REGULUS

Hitherto scenarios have been written by James Dickson, of the staff, but scenarios from outside will be considered. Regulus is interested in original stories and adaptations. With the latter there is a preference for burlesques of classic costume plays, such as those by Shakespeare. At present two-reel comedies are being concentrated on, but these must be free from knock-about and bathroom scenes. Scenarios need not be written for any particular star, and preference is given to those written out scene by scene with synopsis and scene plot. Manuscripts should be addressed to the Scenario Editor, Regulus Films, 48, Carnaby Street, Regent Street, and provided a stamped addressed envelope is enclosed, MSS. will be returned if unsuitable.

SCREEN PLAYS

Scenarios from outside are accepted. These may be original stories or adaptations of novels or plays. What are required are character, drama, light comedy, and any subject of particular interest (five reelers) and need not be written for any particular player. Stories can be submitted either as synopsis or scenarios and should be addressed to the General Manager, at 26, Litchfield Street. Rejected MSS. are returned. Postage should be enclosed.

ZODIAC

Outside scenarios accepted and must be original stories, principally composed of "gags" for two-reel comedies—medium slapstick. All films must be written for Walter Ford as the medium, but it is really of very little use submitting scenarios until his style has been seen. They can be complete, just brief synopsis, or a collection of "gags" to fit together. Rejected scenarios will be returned if a stamped envelope is enclosed.

admiration of all and the success of the picture."

This incident Jeffrey Bernerd used when, later, he crossed swords with Ridgwell, and facetiously remarked: "I have often had a British artiste in my office and said to her: 'I'm going to pay you so much for that part,' whereupon she also genuinely wept."

He then attempted to turn the tables on Ridgwell by asserting that "it is not artistes that we lack but directors—there is not a first-rate director in the country, and I ought to know, because I have to pay directors their salaries."

Bernerd argued that super productions, involving very heavy expenditure, was harming the financial standing of the film trade, and said that when firms cease spending these huge sums then the good British program feature will get its chance and will capture the markets of the world.

He told his audience that he had just returned from the Continent, where he found neither France nor Italy to be serious competitors, but that in Germany he had seen film masterpieces. "America is the best film-producing country in the world, but Germany ranks second easily."

After stating that he had been a good friend to British authors, the managing director of Stoll's finished by stating that it was now time for the leading authors and others to turn their serious attention to writing stories direct for screening.

Among the other speakers were Donald Crisp, Sir Percy Sykes, and Stewart Rome

SUPER PHILOSOPHY

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

III.—An Alien Question

"WHAT do you think of the Russian Ballet?" I asked the Super one evening.

He emerged from his tankard like Venus from the sea—born of the foam.

"I don't know!" he replied concisely, wiping the traces of birth from his lips with the back of his hand "I eastways, I try not to. . . . Troupe of Bounding Bolsheviks!" he added, vindictively. Then, with that wonderful gift of his for taking the mental chasms of conversation in his stride, as it were—"I as good as won a silver belt for clogwalloping myself once!"

"How do you mean 'as good as won it'?" I queried.

"Well a chap I ooster 'ave drinks with won it and sold me the ticket for ninepence," he replied. "I never got it, though. The pop-shop was next door to the pub. I 'ad several tries to get it out, but some'ow I never got past the pub. . . . I've noticed that about pawnshops often," he added meditatively. "They work in with the landlord, I expect."

"But the Russian Ballet is something new in Art," I protested.

"Art is a cart-wheel with a lot of different methods for spokes," he said. "Turn it round a bit and you come to a different spoke: turn it round a bit further and you comes to the one you started with—no good calling it a new one 'cos somebody's painted it red instead of blue while you wasn't looking. It's the same old spoke—got to be if you're going to keep the rim in its place. and the public is the patient old carthorse what pulls the 'ole concern," he added, warming to his simile.

"And the management?" I enquired encouragingly.

"Sits in the cart and cracks a whip. Unless it's a Jew Syndicate—then they blows a horn and tries to pretend it's a Ford. New Art! . . . It's forty-five years since me and Bill 'Iggins did statue dances at the Plumstead Radical Club. Ten bob a night and our beer we got first time: then they said they'd give us a rise—twelve bob and no beer. A rise! And Bill with a mouth like the Goodwins when the tide's out! A rise! I ask yer! I've 'ated Radicals ever since. But about this Russian business. What is it but statue dancing in a new dress—or no dress at all from what I've 'eard. If they was English nobody wouldnt look at them: call them Spitoffski, nobody can get near them for the crowds. . . . Don't tell me! Aliens is what they are. Aliens! Pah! If it hadn't 'ave been for aliens we would'n have 'ad no war. And they talks in Parliament about an Alien Dumping Bill—as if there wasn't enough of 'em dumped 'ere already. I know 'em! I've worked with 'em. You mark my word, if there's a bit of trouble floating round, get to the bottom of it and you'll find an alien."

I felt it was not for me to argue against convictions such as these. I merely caught the barmaid's eye. He had got to the bottom of his "bit of trouble." She refilled it.

"I could tell yer a tale of aliens," he went on, after a well-spent pause. "I was in pantomime with three of 'em once. 'Art Why, there was a greasy Pole playing the Roast Beef of Old England and a bloomin' Hun was the Plum Pudding. Poked out the currants and used the places where they was for spy-holes, it's my belief—or how did them Zeppelins get so close to the Lyceum that time?"

"But the man I was going to tell you about was an Italian. 'Armless enough, but an alien—so not altogether responsible. Well, to show yer—in the summer, with ice a luxury, he sells 'Okey-Pokey: in the winter, when he's only got to chip a bit off the Serpentine, he plays 'Big-heads' for half-a-crown a night. No business instinct—just an alien."

"As far as I was concerned, I used to treat him with the contempt' he deserved. Just an occasional clip on the side of the 'ead to keep him in his place, but no favouritism one way or the other. But big Bert 'Obbs—a 'efty six-footer—made a dead-set on 'Okey,' as we used to call him."

"If there was one thing 'Okey 'ated, it was beetles. No reason for it—just like some men 'ave a horror of water—and knowing of this, one night, just before the Demon Scene, Bert fills up his demon 'ead with about thirty of them. He 'elps 'Okey on with the 'ead just before the scene starts, fixes it good and tight, and pushes him on to the stage. Of course, 'Okey couldn't do nothing, and by the time he come off—what with the beetles crawling in 'is 'air, which was thick, 'iding in his ears, and creeping down the back of 'is 'neck—'e was pretty well off 'is head. 'E never said nothing but 'e gives Bert a look which spelt Murder with a capital M."

"Bert! I says that evening—little knowing how prophetic my words was to prove—'Bert, you'd better go cautious with 'Okey, or you'll be having a sterlotti in yer back one of these dark nights."

"What, 'im! says Bert scornful! Why, he'd have to bring a step-ladder to reach a vital part, and before he was 'alfway up 'e'd 'ave one in the jaw that'd make him forget what 'e'd come up for."

"There was one scene in the show called 'The Zoo.' We was all dressed as animals inside of a big cage, while the comedians tried to be funny about us. Bert and 'Okey played a giraffe—Bert being in front on account of 'is superior 'eight."

"Well, the next night, as usual, Bert got on to 'Okey something cruel. He'd got a sarcastic tongue; Bert 'ad kep' on asking 'im 'ow he got away from 'is organ: said if he really was the missing link, why didn't 'e stay missing: sprinkled Keating's about meaningful when 'Okey was looking. Clever, sardonic stuff like that. Everybody roared except 'Okey—he just watched and waited."

"Then the Zoo scene came along. 'Okey must 'ave managed some'ow to conceal a penknife about his person. In the middle of the scene he gets it open—and jabs! Mind you, as 'ind legs of the giraffe 'is style was a bit cramped, 'e couldn't reach out much—luckily for Bert. But whatever 'e could reach, 'e jabbed—'ard and often. Bert! Bert let out a yell, got the neck of the giraffe through the bars of the cage, and tried to turn round and 'it 'Okey at the same time. For a moment there was pandemonium. Then the cage went over and the curtain come down. It took four of us to separate the giraffe. 'Okey went to the 'ospital with a broken rib, and Bert didn't sit down for three weeks."

"Well, that's an alien! If one of 'em will do that for an old-fashioned British institution like a Christmas pantomime, what's going to 'appen if they starts dumping 'em 'ere 'olesale?"

CLUB CLATTER

ALL thoughts and energies are now directed to the Carnival at the Cecil, on Wednesday, April 26. I learn from the organiser, Billie Bristow, that tickets are now in circulation, and as the supply has been limited in order to allow dancing to take place in comfort, it is a case of first applicants get the tickets. Members tickets have been reduced to below cost price (the Club Funds standing the loss) but each member can only have one. These are at 15s. For non-members the prices are 25s. for singles, £2 7s. 6d. for doubles. Prices in all cases include a four-course supper as well as a running buffet. Tickets have not yet reached the general public, but now that the arrangements are complete for offering them to the public it is probable that all the tickets will be sold within a few days. Which only serves to show that the early bird will be rewarded with a fat, juicy worm in the shape of a ticket!

To-night (Saturday) there will be the usual frolic; dancing from 8.30, members free, guests 2s. 6d. And to-morrow there is to be a billiard tournament at 8 p.m.

REGISTERED SCENARIOS

AS there appears to be some misunderstanding as to the nature of the protection which registration of plays and scenarios affords to members, the committee of the Society of Authors explains:—

The object of the registration is to provide evidence of the date of completion of the play or scenario deposited. It is important therefore, that registration should be made immediately the scenario or play is completed, as the date stamped on the play is necessarily the date of its receipt by the Society. Plays and scenarios are occasionally deposited some months after the plays have been completed.

If the claim to originality is challenged, should the rights in the play be infringed, the evidence of the date of completion which the register affords, may be conclusive in some cases and in most cases will be of material assistance.

The registration does not protect titles, nor is it necessary under the Copyright Act of 1911; it is merely a simple method of securing evidence in the event of dispute.

Scenarios, typewritten in duplicate on quarto paper, may be forwarded to the offices of the Society for registration. One copy will be stamped and returned to the author and the other filed in the register of the Society. Copies of the scenario thus filed may be obtained at any time by the author only subject to payment of the usual typewriting charges.

Original plays may also be filed, subject to the same rules. The fees are:—

Plays: 5s. per Act.

Scenarios: 5s. for first twenty pages or part of twenty pages; 2s. 6d. for each subsequent twenty pages or part of twenty pages.

Minimum Fee in every instance 5s.

Getting the Focus

UNTIL artistes are treated in a fair and business-like manner it is impossible to hope for any marked improvement in the quality of histrionic ability displayed in British films. To a certain extent artistes have themselves to blame. That is to say, they have not yet developed a correct perspective of their own particular place in the scheme of things ; they cannot realise that they are in a camp distinct from their employers and that their interests and the interests of their employers must inevitably clash ; nor have they yet recognised the utter helplessness and complete hopelessness of their position divorced from the strength and fighting capacity that organisation affords. This, of course, is going over the well-beaten ground of the necessity of some protective agency for artistes—the Kinema Artistes' Federation is badly needed.

BUT we have in mind a certain form of grievance that artistes have against producing concerns, and which could very easily be removed without any Federation or use of belligerent methods. We refer to the policy, that is fairly general, of engaging an artiste for a forthcoming production, and causing him to cool his heels about the street, studio, or Club, week after week, while the production is postponed from week to week to suit the convenience of the firm. The position may not have presented itself to the firm ; hence this article. It is grossly unfair that an artiste should be kept from accepting another engagement simply because of the existence of a contract that he has signed for a production that is regularly postponed. It often occurs that the artiste will receive other offers which he cannot close with as this might prevent him playing in the production which has been scheduled for some time, and for which he has been engaged but which is being held up to suit the convenience of the producing firm.

THEN there is another grievance that ought to be looked into. Artistes on daily pay are "called" and rush to the Studio (which may be a dozen miles out of town, to reach which means expenditure of time, energy and money) only to hang about until tea-time to find they are not needed that day. For this wasted day they only receive half pay. And it may be that the artiste has to refuse another engagement in order to obey the "call," and often the half pay is not sufficient to cover the out-of-pocket expenses involved in the day's, fruitless journey, to say nothing of the wear and tear on the artiste's nervous system and its sequential depreciation of the artiste's histrionic abilities.

SURELY heads of our producing concerns are not lacking in business perception to avoid seeing that these methods cannot fail to react to the hurt of

If you have confidence in yourself and believe firmly that you are capable of winning through, you cannot be beaten. You do not need to concern yourself as to whether other people think you can win — all that really matters is for you to know you can.

¶ What every person requires is the will to win. Possessing that, nothing is impossible for — “I can because I will.”

British films. Merely at the dictates of commercial considerations rather than of humanitarian feelings, they ought to remove these two hardships on a class of artistes who contribute so highly to the worth of British pictures in comparison with their remuneration. It ought not to be necessary to wait for the formation of the Federation to remedy these two defects. When the Federation arrives its first duty will be to legalise a Standard Contract which employers will have to sign and which will safeguard artistes on these and other points. In the meanwhile it is to be sincerely hoped that such injustices are removed by the spontaneous action of the film firms.

AGAIN we must direct attention to the quantity—and particularly the quality—of contemporary German films. We ourselves have seen films in Germany (and German films in England, by the way) that are fit to rank with the world's best and Jeffrey Bernerd at the Lyceum Club dinner stated that his recent visit to Germany had convinced him that the Germans were getting well ahead and that some of their pictures are masterpieces. Shortsighted folks may be inclined to complain that German films should be allowed into this country and deplore the fact that the Germans are getting ahead of this country in film production. But that sort of talk effects nothing. Nor should a sickly patriotism be invoked to protest against German films. Neither will frequent use of the words "Bosch" or "Hun" prevent the Germans marching rapidly along the path of progress. The very fact of the high quality of the German films demands an increased quality in British films. In other words, in a competition of merit it is only merit that can tell. The Exhibitors' Association in this country has raised the ban against German films and the public has long since lost its aversion from German goods. Those among British film workers who are loudest in their outcry against German films are probably using handkerchiefs made in Germany, and wearing boots made in Austria. And very few British artistes would turn down a good offer to play in a German film.

IT is therefore a sign of weakness when we try to fight German films by putting obstacles in their way, when all the time the only sure way to combat them is to beat them by the sheer force of superior quality. A writer in the Observer who has just returned from Germany says: "The film business in Germany is being taken very seriously. It is receiving as much attention as the iron, steel and other great industries, and it is more and more coming to be regarded as a business of the utmost importance by German financiers and bankers." Therein lies the secret of the big advance in the quality of German films—the industry is not regarded as a get-rich-quick bucket shop concern, nor as a hobby, but as much an industry demanding the best brains and keenest financial experts as any other big business. It is time that the British industry was regarded as seriously and financially backed as effectively.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Last Sunday I said "Good-bye" to Maurice Elvey and his leading lady, Madge Stuart, who, with Bertram Burleigh and the other Stoll notabilities, left London for Nice. Here for the next three weeks Mr. Elvey will direct scenes in an important production. As has already been announced, Miss Stuart is to be his "leading lady" for life, but the date of the wedding has now been suddenly advanced from early in May to the end of the present month for the reason that the bride-to-be, like so many other girls, feels that there may be something in the old superstition about May being an unlucky month to marry in. The wedding banquet is to take place at the Savoy.

* * *

Arthur Rooke's secretary, Millicent Bromhead, writes to tell me of an incident that occurred while the "Bachelor's Baby" company was away in Torquay working on exteriors. She says: "The lady who had kindly lent us her garden to take some of our scenes in was telling a lady friend that she had some kinema folk making a picture in her garden, and on inquiring what they were making she was told the name of the film. She immediately remarked, 'How very disgusting! I don't think the young people of to-day are at all nice!'"

* * *

To-morrow there arrives in London Knut Jeukling, the editor of the Biograph Bladet, the well-known Swedish film paper. This gentleman is here to study the film conditions of this country and the prospect for an interchange of British and Swedish pictures and artistes. He will be delighted to meet British directors at the Regent Palace Hotel, where he will be staying for a week.

* * *

I understand that the film rights of "The Clatter of the Clogs," by Arthur Applin, have been acquired by Captain Harry Lambart for his next production, and negotiations are nearing completion for the special engagement of one of America's foremost screen stars (who, by the way, is an Englishman) to play in the production opposite Cora Goffin and Henderson Bland. Captain Lambart has made arrangements for the use of one of the largest steel works in the country for several of his scenes, together with big cotton mills in Lancashire. The owners have agreed to allow upwards of 10,000 of their workpeople from the factories to take part in the big riot scene, in which a palatial mansion, specially built for the occasion, will be burnt to the ground.

* * *

On our front cover this week is the photograph of our baronet-actor, and I have just heard of a peculiar coincidence in connection with him. It was on March 31, 1919, that Sir Simeon walked on in front of the kine. camera for the first time, and in the company of Dorothy Fane. At the close of the scene Sir Simeon and Miss Fane were photographed in a close-up. And now, on March 31, 1922, Sir Simeon finished his twentieth picture—it is "Creation," the Raleigh King production, in which he and Dorothy Fane play leading parts. And to complete the cycle of coincidences that day happens to be his wedding-day anniversary!

* * *

Just as Smiths in the commercial world are as numerous as the sands on the seashore, so the film world has a profusion of Gordons.

TRADE SHOW GUIDE

WHERE AND WHEN TO SEE YOUR FILMS.

THE only British productions to be Trade shown this week are from the Ideal studio. The first is which was directed by A. V. Bramble, and is a screen version of E. Bronte's novel.

"SHIRLEY,"

The cast includes Carlotta Breeze, who plays Shirley, Elizabeth Irving, Clive Brook, Mabel Terry Lewis, Harvey Braban, Joe Nightingale, David Millar, and Dimitri Vetter.

TRADE SHOW: Wednesday, April 12, at the Shaftesbury Pavilion, at 11.30 a.m.

* * *

Elliot Stannard is responsible for the scenario of the Ideal screen version of the W. W. Jacobs novel, which was directed by Thomas Bentley, and photographed by William Shenton.

"A MASTER OF CRAFT,"

Fred Groves plays lead and is supported by Pope Stammer, Charles Windermere, Eva Westlake, José Shannon, Ida Fane, Reginald Baek, Lilian Douglas, Mercy Hattor, Winifred Dennis, Jerold Robertshaw, Charles Ashton, Harry A. Meymott, Arthur Cleave, Charles Callum, and John Kelt.

TRADE SHOW: Thursday, April 13, at the New Gallery Kinema, at 11.30 a.m.

This profusion is leading to confusion, and I am asked by L. B. Lestocq to explain that the Leo Gordon of the Screen and Stage Booking Offices and the Edward R. Gordon (now directing Flora Le Breton and George K. Arthur) are two distinct persons. Mr. Leo is the successful stage and studio agent and Mr. Edward R. is the director of "The Haig Serial" and "Repentance." Screen and Stage, by the way, has just removed to 66, Shaftesbury Avenue, owing to the increase in business.

* * *

John Gliddon has just returned from Egypt and Nice with the International Artists Company, after having been away nearly two months on location for "Lark's Nest," which he is directing. The members of the party are all looking extremely well, and are now working like fury at the old R.P.-Lasky Studios at Islington.

* * *

Everything seems to indicate the Bird Film Company as being one of our big concerns. Donald Crisp has fitted up the Kingsbury Studios with an excellent lighting equipment that he brought back with him from the Continent, and now he is awaiting the arrival of Margaret Turnbull, for whom he cabled to America. Miss Turnbull, it will be remembered, always wrote Don's scenarios for him at the Islington Studios.

* * *

And now the latest is that J. Stuart Blackton has joined Bird and will direct Georges Carpentier in the first National Super Production (as the Bird output will be called). I understand that Andrew Soutar conducted the negotiations that resulted in the boxer signing the contract, but I cannot help thinking that this craze for names—first Lady Di and now Carpentier—cannot be in the best interests of British films. Blackton is to present Carpentier "as a dramatic artiste and not as a boxer" in this picture. Surely we have some good professional dramatic artistes who could play the part as well.

SUPER PHILOSOPHY

by HUGH F. WRIGHT

III.—Personality.

"ART," said the Super, sententiously, "take my word for it, it's one part art and three parts personality. O' course, there's tecknick, but that's only the polish give it by experience."

"And how would you define personality?" I asked.

"Ah! There you've got me," admitted the Super. "Some 'as it, some 'asn't. If you've got it, cherish it as you would a ewege lamb. If you 'aven't, stick to the paternal potato-patch, and don't try the Prodigal Son stunt. It ain't every prodigal father keeps veal for the 'appy return, and you've got to go a long way ter find a swine who'll blooming well offer you a husk, let alone share 'em. But persnerality! Look at George Robey! You could put red on yer nose, black yer eyebrows, and say 'desist' till the cows come 'ome and you'll be lucky to get free beer at the village smoker: while 'e gets . . . Well, that's persnerality."

"Tecknick? That comes with experience. And you can over-do it, too. I've known chaps as was so smothered with tecknick that their persnerality couldn't come up to breathe. There was one chap I played with used ter say: 'The art of acting is the art of pausing: like music, you must have a bar's rest now and again.' 'E 'ad plenty of them, I'll say that for 'im, 'e acted up to 'is principles. 'E was doing 'Amlet's Soliloquy—you know—'Ter be—or—not ter be! 'E 'ad a way of looking into the gallery and pausing after the third word, very effective. But one night 'e paused so long a lady in the gallery became quite indignant and offensive . . . And the rest of the soliloquy was chorus. Yes, tecknick's all right, but you can over-do it. But I was talkin' of persnerality."

"There 'as a pal of mine—Alf 'Opkins—'ad as much of it as any man I ever met. Signor Binetti 'e called 'imself on the bills, and what that man couldn't do with wild animals wasn't worth mentioning."

"'E was only a little man, with waxed moustaches sticking up like meat 'ooks each side of 'is nose, but when 'e looked at a lion, it 'ud sit up and beg like a 'uman being. About five foot four 'e was, in 'is socks, and every inch persnerality."

"I was at the aquarium at the time in the performing flea line. 'E 'ad a cage of forest-bred tigers, bears and hyenas, and we got quite friendly, bein' as it were in the same line of business, in a manner o' speaking."

"One day 'e comes up to me and 'e says: 'Bill,' 'e says, 'what do you think o' materimony?'"

"For what purpose?" I asks. "As a 'obby, or a test of indurance?"

"I don't know if you've noticed the lady who always sits in the front row, Wednesdays and Fridays," 'e says, ignoring my persiflage.

"As a matter of fact I 'ad, no one could 'av 'elped it. She wasn't fat, she was hewn out of the solid marble four-square—massive—that's the word. 'She came to my show, the other day,' says I. 'Three of my fleas broke their front teeth on 'er and gave up in disgust,' I says."

"She adores me," says Alf.

"She'll overlay you," says I. "An' you'll be nothing but a 'eadline and 'alf a column in the "News o' the World.""

"She 'as money!" 'e says.

"Alf," I answers, seeing 'e was serious. 'Don't get swelled 'ead over a few wild animals. Lions is lions, but winmen is the devil,' I says.

"Soon after that I lost sight of 'm, and didn't see 'im again for six months. Then I met 'im, one Sunday morning walking down Kennington Road with a dirty-faced boy of about ten 'olding on to 'is 'and. 'E wore a frock-coat and a top 'at, very dossy—but 'is moustaches 'ad the downward droop of servitude."

"'Ullo, Alf! I says. 'Come along in an' 'ave one!'"

"If you goes into a public-'ouse, I'll tell mother," says the pasty-faced straphanger.

"'Erbert!' says I, bending low and taking in the situation at a glance. 'Ow much?"

"'Erbert (anyway, 'e answered to the name, so 'is real one don't matter), smiles, a nasty, knowin' smile. 'I don't know what it's worth to you,' 'e says, 'but it's worth a bob to father."

"Right!" I says, 'anding over. 'Now you can be reported missing for a quarter of an hour,' I says, 'and if the worst is confirmed' I says, 'the nation ain't going into permanent mourning,' I says."

"Alf!" I says, when we was entrenched. 'Alf! What does this mean?"

"She's got seven of 'em," 'e answered. 'And 'er first 'usband must have been Sherlock 'Olmes, and they all take after 'im. She's got money alright, mind, fifteen shillings a week she allows me. Seven shillings a week to keep them quiet, seven shillings for recreation, and a shilling a week I puts by for my fare to Australia."

"Why don't you put 'er in 'er place?" says I.

"'Cos it 'ud be brought in murder,' says 'e, succinctly.

"I thinks a bit. 'Supposin' I was to send you a lion as a present,' says I.

"Tain't me birfday, fank Gawd!" says 'e.

"Supposing 'e was to get loose,' says I, taking no notice. 'Supposing you was to keep 'im subdued by the power o' your eye, and supposin' your eye was to weaken, unless satisfactory terms was made."

"'E brightens a bit. 'If it could be done for a fiver——' 'e says."

"I won't tell you how I done it, but when it's a pal . . . well, it was done, any'ow."

"I meets him six weeks later. Same droop in 'is mostache, same kid, only this time it was a couple of bob, and 'e paid."

"And I'd give 'alf-a-crown," 'e says, when we was alone, 'for the pleasure of telling you what I thinks of yer, you interfering hyena!" 'e says."

"Didn't the lion come off?" I asks.

"Come off!" 'e echoes, with a groan. 'Come off!' 'E stayed on! The Missis calls 'im Carlo, and I'm training 'im to the 'ouse. And if you've got any more bright ideas,' 'e says, 'for Gawd's sake sit on 'em and 'atch 'em out yourself."

The Super paused and drank thoughtfully.

"Chock-full of persnerality, 'e was," he sighed at last. "Chock-full! But 'e was only a 'alf bottle. She was a 'magnum' and she 'eld more. You never know with wimmin."

SCREEN AUTHORSHIPS

by SYDNEY MORGAN.

III.—Adapting.

THE late Sydney Grundy was one of our foremost playwrights, and his fame mainly rested on "A Pair of Spectacles."

It was an adaptation.

The play adaptor is so well esteemed and his work so valued that as often as not he is given the credit of authorship, with this consequence, that many established and proved authors make adaptation part of their life work.

"We can't afford to pay much for the scenario, the book rights cost £2,000," is the basis of negotiation with the screen writer. Adapted by the Maywater Typewriting Co. might very well be written of some film versions. How can it be otherwise when the payment is considered.

Let us presume that we have a number of competent screen writers, experienced, clever men, who know their job. Their work is sure to be influenced by the price paid, when it is remembered that £100 is considered a very good payment for adaptation. A scenario can be written in a week. There will be nothing really to complain of if it is done by an experienced scenarist. The story will be understandable and the continuity will be there.

There are books that so lend themselves to screening that it may pass as good work, but the probability is that when it comes to the test of exhibition the verdict will be that the story did not get over, or was apparently unsuitable, or did not lend itself.

Explanatory titles, fade outs, flash backs, visions, follow the novel and then it is the author's fault. In a recent production three characters told the story of their lines in flash backs, and in another thirty-five explanatory or leading titles were used. There are adaptations so uninspired that even the emotions of the characters have to be told in titles.

No time limit should ever be placed on adaptation, but the most conscientious worker in the world cannot avoid the conscious or sub-conscious influence of how much he will receive at the end of his commission. He has to eat and pay rent, and he might want to provide for age and infirmity.

The writing of a scenario in a week is much less exacting work than the writing of one in eight weeks. There is little or no creative work in the former. It hardly enters one's brain; difficulties are explained, the author's method of construction more or less followed, the scenes played as written, and there you are.

Work without a time limit, absorb your story, study every character, weigh up a dozen methods of telling it, work it all out one way, and then decide against it and do it again, get half through, find a snag, refuse to explain and scrap the lot, spend a day over one title, re-write twenty pages to avoid a fade out, find that the re-writing has added 500 feet and that the remedy is worse than the complaint, stop for an hour or a day at the end of every scene to consider whether it can be lifted or improved in any way, complete your script, and have a nice, clean copy typed, then sit in judgment on it, and probably start again.

Sometimes this happens, all of it; sometimes it does not but every adaptation should be calculated for from this standpoint, if the best results are needed.

Is the patience and endurance involved possible if the mind is not free from financial care?

ORGANISING THE ARTISTES

by ESS JEE.

H. R. Barbor quite "gives the show away" in his article in last week's STUDIO.

To be horribly and brutally candid—this is the position: From an artiste's point of view, the industry is overcrowded, and real kinema artistes, i.e., those who devote themselves to screen-work alone, are swamped and crowded-out by the never-ceasing stream of broken-down, out of work artistes from stage and music hall—our friends of the A.A. and V.A.F. They find in screen-work a haven of refuge, which enables many of them to exist. Both are highly-organised and rigidly exclude kinema artistes from the stage.

On the other hand, being unorganised, kinema artistes cannot exclude A.A. and V.A.F. artistes; they never do, because most agents are either ex-actors or ex-variety stage men, who, having their erstwhile comrades "resting," at once suggest a screen job to fill in time, quite naturally giving them preference to mere screen artistes. How ill-fitted, as a rule, they are for screen work, our British films show.

It is really too funny, the invaders and attackers objecting to the attacked organising themselves for self-defence. But for Mr. Barbor to assert pontifically, "I cannot acquiesce in the setting up of a second organisation," is too absurd. Has he ever been asked to do so, and by whom?

The real truth is that the stage is jealous of the screen and its popular appeal. They see they cannot crush it, so they seek to control it, by offering to manage its affairs for the screen artistes, by urging them to join the A.A. or V.A.F., thus adding to their own funds and membership-roll.

The moment a pantomime is finished all the supers and even artistes flock to their erstwhile comrades, who are now agents, and get work on the screen. Some of the "megaphone men" too are erstwhile stage and hall actors, and studio managers and their assistants have too many of those secret "fifty-fifty" arrangements with these ex-variety agents to give the screen-actors a fair chance. They profit pecuniarily by cutting down screen-artistes' pay.

What matters it that British films suffer? They are enriched, and can swank about in their motor-cars, and Riviera jaunts, etc., while their victims starve?

When one finds an extremely influential position in a leading firm occupied by an ex-draper's counter-jumper, and a much-boomed director as an ex-bus-conductor, what can you expect from British films? Both have gained their position by insufferable insolence and arrogance, not by merit or ability. Swank, bluff, bullying, and bounce may succeed in obtaining an undeserved position, but it cannot be good for the art, as a whole, or in the long run.

Ex-actors from stage or hall rarely make good directors—they cannot rid themselves of stage traditions.

There is imperative need for kinema artistes to organise in self-defence, but let them see to it that they keep control. It is no use organising and letting "Megaphone Men" control. There are times when they need putting in their places. An organisation controlled by them could not do this. There are some who are most considerate of the artistes who act for them, and study their conveniences and comfort in a really friendly way. But there there are others, and many of them, as every screen artiste knows to his cost.

Megaphone Men are so highly paid that they can well afford their own organisation, as they now have. Let them not

CREATING "CREATION"

Raleigh King Film Productions is now busily engaged at the Watcombe Hall studio at Torquay on the production of "Creation," the story of which deals in a novel manner with spiritualism.

Dorothy Fane plays the part of the heroine, with Frank Dane opposite to her, and Sir Simeon Stuart as the doctor. Frances Paton, Percy Norton, and Thelma Murray are also in the cast.

Humberstone Wright, whose name is well-known to British film and theatre-goers, is directing the production, and full advantage is being taken of the excellent scenery in the grounds of the studio and the near-by countryside.

Raleigh King is the son of the well-known racing personality. Born in London, Mr. King lived in Germany and France for many years before the war, returning to England in 1912. He then became interested in the stage, and played at the Little Theatre in "The Three Wayfarers," and with Charles Hawtrey. He also appeared in "The Seven Keys to Baldpate," and with Philip Carr.

In 1914 when war broke out he joined up in the Royal Sussex, obtained a commission and went through the Loos-Somme engagements. King was mentioned in despatches, and was very seriously wounded.

During the latter part of his Army career he was instrumental in organising a great many concert and theatrical parties at various camps. On demobilisation, he became interested in British films, and has formed the company which is now working at Torquay. Although anxious to appear in his own films, Mr. King is sufficiently modest to make his screen début with his own company in a small part—that of a friend of the heroine's.

try to prevent the underpaid actors, who can barely keep body and soul together, from organising in self-defence, against the tyranny they have at present to endure from insolent studio managers, directors, agents, and even their underlings. Actors spoil them all by meekly submitting, uncomplainingly, to these injustices. Let them combine in self-defence, and so take one step to make our British films what they should be—the very best in the world.

GREG SCOTT versus BROADWEST

In the King's Bench Division on Wednesday, before Justice Coleridge, an action was brought by Gregory Scott, Kenyon Mansions, Queen's Club Gardens, against Broadwest Films, Ltd., of Wardour Street, claiming damages for alleged breach of contract. Plaintiff, said his counsel, Mr. Moyes, had been earning over £1,000 a year, and for many years had played leading parts in cinema productions of the defendants. In March, 1921, defendants entered into a contract with the plaintiff for a continuation of his services for another year, which he had rendered under a previous contract. Bad times had arisen in the film world and plaintiff agreed to modify his terms and fresh terms were that plaintiff was to be engaged for ten months, to receive £7 weekly by way of retaining fee for each week when not working, and payment of £140 for every film in which he should act. Plaintiff entered upon his employment under the fresh terms, and had received his fee, but the defendants, without cause, dismissed him on July 1, 1921, and, observed counsel, they did not appear now to defend this action.

Plaintiff gave evidence.

His Lordship entered judgment for the plaintiff for £567 and costs.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

IT is very disconcerting to learn that there is a large number of members so lacking in a sense of the fitness of things that they have not yet paid their first year's subscription. It is impossible to run a club on these lines: assets are of little use unless they are realisable, and the Treasurer cannot meet bills with promises only. If these defaulting members continue to owe their dues I am informed that drastic action will be taken with them, except, of course, in the cases of those members who have been courteous enough to write and explain that the pressure of economic circumstances, due to the depressed condition of the profession, is causing them financial embarrassment at the moment. I am informed that the secretary is writing to every member of the club explaining the situation, and I take this opportunity of backing up his appeal by urging all members (and others) who have confidence in the club to support it on this occasion.

We have all missed the genial presence of the club's guardian angel—Kate Gurney—but she writes to tell me that she will soon be returning from Torquay where she has been playing in Raleigh King's "Creation." This film, by the way, is almost a club production, as the director, Humberstone Wright, is a member, and he cast his seven principals, including his leads, Dorothy Fane and Simeon Stuart, in the general lounge of the club.

Everybody is talking of the excellent menu that is now on for lunch and dinner. Jack Gordon tells me that this is due to the fact that he has installed a new chef, who has brought with him, not only culinary skill and experience, but a number of his own private recipes. Lunch time is a very busy time, and the dinners are getting more popular every week.

Reverting to the subject of Humberstone Wright casting "Creation" at the club reminds me to remind you that if you are "resting" it will pay you to rest at the club. Several people who have been casting recently have told me that they often ring up the club or pop round, in the hopes of finding certain artistes. All artiste members should conspire to make the club a centre for casting, so that directors and others can always rely on finding there any type of artiste required. I also appeal to those who may be casting to ring up Regent 2131, or call round at 9, Great Newport Street, for the best British artistes available.

It is expected that the first Kinema Club Production will be commenced in the next week or so. It will be based on a story by a leading British writer, and scenarised by a club member. The production will be finished by the end of June, and already an offer that will bring in £10,000 has been made for it. Artistes and others who are prepared to accept any part in the production are asked to communicate with the secretary. Florence Turner and several other leading artistes have offered to play any part—lead, small, or crowd—that the committee may think fit. This is the spirit that will ensure success.

By the way, Florence Turner told me at the Lyceum Club dinner that our club was the first and only she had ever joined. That is just the sort of spontaneous and gracious compliment which that charming artiste would pay.

Arrangements for the Kinema Club Carnival are proceeding apace. Billie Bristow, the hon. organiser, tells me that books of tickets are now in circulation, and can be obtained from the Manager. Tom Webster, the Daily Mail cartoonist, has been invited, and I have reason to believe that he will be present, and Pola Negri, the Polish artiste, has also consented to attend. Many other celebrities will be present including—you?

Tickets for the carnival:—Members 15s. (one ticket only for each member), non-members 25s. single, £2 7s. 6d. double. And you must get 'em quickly.

Last Saturday there was another of our famous frolics. Quite a crowd of dancers took the floor, and a jolly time ensued. On Sunday Geoffrey Benstead and Tony Fraser met in a billiard match for 350 up. Geoff gave Tony 155, and beat him by more than his points. Tony swears r-r-r-revenge!

This was followed by a novel stunt in the same room, and was organised by the indefatigable Harry Worth. This was a three-minutes handicap for ladies and gents, and after a fierce tussle the first prize went to Harry Walton, while Evelyn Cecil collared the second prize. I hope Harry will repeat these handicaps—they're great fun.

This week-end is going to be another topper:—To-night (Saturday) there will be the usual weekly "hop." Members free, guests 2s. 6d.; dancing commences at 8.30. On Sunday there is to be another old-time concert, similar to the one that was held some weeks ago when Sydney Paxton was the chairman. On Sunday Fred Groves will be the chairman, and a rollicking good time is promised. Dinner is at 6.30, and the concert starts at 8.30.

"WHERE HONOUR IS DUE."

YEARS ago, more years ago than some of our present-day film stars care to remember, when the kinema was very young, and before it was taken seriously, hundreds of nameless artistes flashed across the silver sheet. By gradual process, the names of the artistes were given on the screen. Then picturegoers began to choose their favourites; then the Press agent came into existence and began to boost certain artistes, until they became famous, and the picture, story and set faded into insignificance before the publicity-made all-conquering star.

Time went on and the man who made the picture, who made these great stars, began to wonder why he could not share, to a certain extent, some of the glory of the picture. He thought the matter over and decided to have his name mentioned on the screen, some even went as far as to have their photo on the sub-title. So it came about that the director began to be spoken of, until in some instances the name of the director was sufficient to fill the theatre, even though the artistes appearing in the production were quite unknown.

Meanwhile through all this a man worked; worked hard and conscientiously to see that the talent of the artiste and the genius of the director was not wasted by bad photography. He strived to help the director by constantly experimenting and inventing trick effects, and to help the star by judiciously lighting up her features and making her look beautiful.

To this man both the star and the director owed a great deal. It was some time before the cameraman's name was mentioned on the screen; but most pictures nowadays mention the photographer. Some day, perhaps, the cameraman will come into his own and the Press notices will mention him. The time is bound to come; it is only a matter of waiting, and when such a state of affairs does exist, it will be a better time for the man behind the camera.

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

IT is interesting to note that most of the cameramen filming the Grand National were members of the Society. On such jobs as this the value of the Society is evident, for all these cameramen knew each, through getting acquainted at the meetings. If there had been no Society, it is doubtful whether such a spirit of camaraderie would have existed and whether the cameramen would have enjoyed themselves to the extent they did.

Kenneth Gordon has taken in hand the arrangements for the Kine-Cameramen's Society Annual dinner, which will be held next month in honour of the secretary's return from India. Members who are anxious to attend the dinner should get in touch with the acting-secretary regarding tickets, so that he can get some idea of the number intending to be present.

Wednesday's meeting suffered as a result of all the cameramen being away filming the important events of the season. This did not, however, deter the members present from holding quite a long and interesting meeting and afterwards the usual discussion.

The unemployment list of the Society is now not nearly so large as it was a few weeks back. Many more members are working as a result of the present boom in film producing.

FILMING THE NATIONAL.

The filming of a big public event such as the Grand National involves an organisation that is not dissimilar to that carried out by a G.H.Q. on a battlefield. Each of the Pathé operators was provided with a blue-print map, on which the position he was to occupy with his camera was indicated, in addition to a chart and directions telling him at what locality he had to mobilise his exposed negatives when the horses had passed his lens.

Cameramen were stationed at each of the seventeen jumps, and reserve operators were in the vicinity, their special task being to obtain pictures of sensational falls, startling jumps or similar dramatic incidents that occurred during the contest.

SLOWING DOWN THE NATIONAL.

A slow motion camera that took pictures at the amazing speed of one hundred and sixty a second was turned on the Grand National by Kenneth Gordon, of Pathé's. A specially erected wooden tower was built to accommodate the camera, which, owing to the high speed at which it works, requires a particularly steady base to operate from. The object of this innovation was to obtain unique screen studies of the jumping horses.

Apart from their entertaining aspect, these slow-motion pictures of racing, which rank amongst the first of their kind, provide an interesting analysis of the movements of thoroughbreds in action. The varying poises of the animals' legs, and the grace that is normally hidden by the swiftness of their movements is attractively revealed, as well as the amazing tenacity with which jockeys cling to stumbling mounts.

The wonder is that any results were obtained at all, for the day was very dull and not likely to improve results with such a quick exposure.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

THE filming of the Grand National is one of the events of the cameraman's somewhat eventful year. The Pathé Gazette again secured a scoop on this big racing event, and took about twenty cameramen down to Liverpool to cover the various jumps. As was the case last year, the cameramen thoroughly enjoyed the trip, for it is seldom that many get together on one stunt. The film, which was taken on Friday, was billed to be showing at Covent Garden on the following day.

D. P. Cooper is busy down at the Stoll studio on the new Coleby production, which is now in course of production. Some of Cooper's work was to be seen recently when Stoll trade-showed "The Peacemaker."

Arthur A. St. Brown and Basil Emmott spent some hours recently turning night into day. They arrived at Twyford Abbey with an outfit of Sunlight arcs and filmed quite a few midnight shots for "Byron," Captain Calvert's new Gaumont production.

Frank Grainger is away on location, filming some scenes of the new W. W. Jacob's comedies which are now being made for Artistic. Grainger secured some good shots in the last two comedies, and the weather at the time was anything but ideal for filming; so, given some good weather, such as we have been having lately, he should get some good results.

I see that Eve's Film Review has now been given a new title, and will in future be known as Eve and Everybody's Film Review. This should be particularly gratifying to Kenneth Gordon, for it will give him an opportunity to extend the scope of his activities. Hitherto he has been filming subjects of interest to women only, now it will be subjects of general interest.

Theodore Thumwood is busy at Master's on a new production, "Cocaine." As it is a story of night club life, Thumwood should be able considerably to enhance its value photographically by means of various little effects. The lighting of all Thumwood's pictures is usually good and of a novel description.

Perhaps one of the smallest and certainly the most central studios in London is Pathé's in Wardour Street. The studio is, despite its size, well equipped with Sunlight arcs, and some good results can be obtained there. It is being used at present by Eve's Film Review and the Pathé Pictorial. It was originally Pathé's Roof Garden Theatre, but was converted some little time back. Few studios can boast of having been visited by more celebrities in so short a time as Pathé's can; for most of the well-known stage, screen and dancing stars have been there for the purpose of being pictorially interviewed.

SCREEN VALUES

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"The Recoil."

Hardy—Starring Eille Norwood, Phyllis Titmus and Lawrence Anderson—Directed by Geoffrey Malins—Scenario by Rafael Sabatini—Photography by Germaine Berger.

GIVEN rather an unconvincing story, Geoffrey Malins has succeeded in getting the best out of it and making out of some rather unnatural characters almost real people.

The acting on the whole is just average. Lawrence Anderson gives an excellent interpretation of the hypnotist. He proves himself to be an exceedingly clever heavy. Eille Norwood is rather disappointing, his work in previous productions being far better and far more convincing. His part gives him little opportunity, however. Phyllis Titmuss makes her screen début in this production. Her part is a difficult one, because it is unreal, she makes the best of it, and, if given a better opportunity, would do exceedingly well as a screen artiste. Dawson Millward is quite good.

The story, as we have already suggested, is not at all convincing in screen form. The continuity is good and has been fairly well preserved throughout the production.

Germaine Berger's photography possesses one or two minor flaws, but, on the whole, is of a fairly good standard. The lighting of the interiors is excellent, and the exteriors have been well shosen.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Good.

LEADS: Good interpretations of difficult parts.

SUPPORTS: Average, with one or two outstanding.

LITERARY: Unconvincing story. Well preserved continuity.

INTERIORS: Well done.

EXTERIORS: Carefully chosen.

LIGHTING: Good.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Fairly well done.

"The Persistent Lovers."

George Clarke—Starring Ivy Duke, Guy Newall—Supports: A Bromley-Davenport, Ernest A. Douglas, Barbara Everest, Winifred Sadler, Laurence Davidson, Julian Royce and Douglas Munro—Photography by Bert Ford—Art direction by Charles Dalmore—Titles by Alex Scruby.

A CHARMING piece of screen art of the lighter type, and distinctly a film which achieved success largely because of the high level of its acting.

It successfully gets out of the beaten track of home production, there being a notable lack of heaviness, both in the story and in its treatment.

In theme it is comedy in the true sense, and though descending to obvious burlesque in some details, the effect is not incongruous but in harmony with the spirit of lighthearted fun pervading the whole thing.

The scissors could be used to speed up the action midway, but otherwise it is difficult to suggest improvements in a feature which should provide really original and pleasing entertainment.

The acting is excellent, and the leads by no means dominate either the opportunities or the effect. Ivy Duke has, in fact, been most happily cast; she plays in an excellent spirit of fun, and will also appeal strongly in her sentimental scenes, but some of the scenes demand rather more impetuosity than she possesses.

Guy Newall is attractive and likeable in all he does—an excellent performance of a "big boy" part.

As the Duke of Harborough, A. Bromley-Davenport seems to have determined to show the Americans just how far it is possible to carry the caricature of the British aristocracy, but though the part is an extreme burlesque, it is an extremely amusing one and brilliantly played.

Laurence Davidson's portrayal of the very difficult part of the dual-lover is also a burlesque and a credit to the artiste.

As the hero's recluse clergyman-father, Ernest A. Douglas is responsible for some fine and subtle facial expressions, and altogether for one of the most convincing characterisations in the subject.

Douglas Munro's manservant is another perfectly finished study, which looms somewhat larger in the total effect than, from

FILM FOLKS.

A Reply to Lady Astor by Freda Kaye.

WE'RE a very jolly lot

And we do not care a jot
For insinuations launched by Lady Astor.

We are hard at work all day
And have not much time for play
Or to rally round the family Church and Pastor.

STILL I think you'll mostly find
That a charitable mind
Is an attribute to which we claim possession.
And it does not seem quite fair
That a lady from Mayfair
Should be slinging stones wholesale at Our Profession.

THERE are many folk much faster
I assure you, Lady Astor,
You will find them 'mongst the Highest and the Lowest.
So when next you speak your mind
Be more lenient, just, and kind:
And be careful of the wisdom (?) which thou showest.

his comparatively small opportunities, one would think possible. Every artist will admire it intensely.

Ernie Nichol, Barbara Everest, Julian Royce and Winifred Sadler have somewhat smaller opportunities, but all make the most of them.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Excellent in respect to the control of artistes and the setting of separate scenes; there is just a suspicion of looseness in the story development.

LEADS: Very good.

SUPPORTS: Exceptionally good.

LITERARY: A very good scenario, with real imagination in its details.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Some very good effects and generally good, if not, as a whole, up to the exceptional George Clarke standard.

EXTERIORS: Good night effects and picturesque scenes on the Broads.

INTERIORS: Very well done, with some novel viewpoints.

"A Romance of Old Baghdad."

Thompson—Starring Matheson Lang—Supports: Manora Thew, Henry Victor, Barbara Everest, Douglas Munro, Dacia Victor McLaglen, Roy Travers, George Foley, George Bellamy—Directed by Kenelm Foss—Scenario by Kenelm Foss—Photography by John Parker and Patrick Quinn.

KENELM FOSS has made the mistake of introducing too many characters into the film, with the result that one loses interest in the main in attempting to follow a number of subsidiary themes. A number of characters are included who have nothing whatever to do with the plot, although it is possible that they are quite important characters in the novel.

The Eastern atmosphere has been quite well preserved, and the customs of the country are for the most part true to life.

The acting is not of a very high standard. Matheson Lang is disappointing, some of his previous work being of far better quality.

Henry Victor's work is not up to his usual standard. His interpretation of the part lacks vigour, and suggests that he has not been too well handled.

Manora Thew gives an excellent performance; and Dacia, a newcomer to the screen, gives a fine study of the desert girl.

Douglas Munro modestly hides himself behind a huge moustache, which gives him little opportunity for facial expressions, but what he cannot accomplish with his face he accomplishes with gesticulations, which at no time appear exaggerated.

Victor McLaglen has little to do but look savage. Needless to say he does it well.

Harding Steerman, Roy Travers, George Bellamy, George Foley and Barbara Everest all appear in important parts; although the characters they portray are quite unnecessary in the unfolding of the tale, there is little fault to be found with their work.

One of the chief reasons for the picture not being the success it should have been is the adaptation. The continuity is not good, because it is impossible to tell the story in a straightforward manner when there are so many side issues to be gone into.

Patrick Quinn and John Parker have missed a fine opportunity for some lighting effects that would considerably have enhanced the production. The East is a place of contrasts; in the sun it is brilliant, and in the shadow black. By carefully arranging the shadows and properly setting the lights, some excellent effects could have been obtained. We do not mean harsh photography for the shadows; the light could have been softened down and still would have given the desired effect. The photography is, however, quite straightforward, without any attempts at effects of any kind.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Poor.

LEAD: Matheson Lang, fair.

SUPPORTS: Good.

LITERARY: Badly adapted; continuity patchy.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Uninspired and occasionally harsh.

LIGHTING: Ordinary.

INTERIORS: First-rate.

EXTERIORS: Fine.

UNBOUND MOROCCO

Adrian Brunel and the Solar Company return.

APRIL THE FIRST was a great day for me this year. On that day I returned to England and had my first glimpse of the Kinema Club. My chest heaved with pride—the proud paternal stuff.

Congratulations!

I am going to make up for lost time there. I shall drop in every day and collar a member and tell him all about my adventures abroad. In a couple of months time, when guests are brought to the Club, members will point to me and say, "You see that fellow with the Spanish whiskers—well, he's just come back from Spain and Morocco. He's our Club Bore."

I was sorry there were not more members present to have seen Allighan and I greet each other as I entered the Club. It was a wonderful handshake—two long-lost cowboy brothers, each gripping the other's manly fist in the boisterous fashion of the heroes of a serial film. A stirring sight—John Dunbar and Bruce Allen saw us and had to turn away.

Those of my friends in the profession who I have seen since my return to England seem to be in a conspiracy to force me to say that I have taken some wonderful pictures. Certainly there could hardly be a more attractive background for a story than Spain and Morocco. We have some wonderful shots in "Broken Sand."

In Spain we have scenes in and around Granada, including a bull-fight, and also in the Alhambra—for which we had a special Royal permit to shoot scenes. Some of the shots with the snow-capped Sierra Nevada in the back-ground, are wonderfully beautiful. In Morocco there was no end to the picturesqueness of the Orient; we used over 112 different locations there. Each location was most critically chosen and Crispin Hay, who did the shooting, should have every reason to be proud of his work.

Hay is now in Paris trying to arrange to have the film developed and printed there. If I bring the negative to England I shall have to pay several hundreds of pounds in iniquitous taxation. It does not tempt one to go abroad in search of reality. So long as the 5d. a foot negative tax is applied to British productions, so long will we be suffering a restriction to the development of our art and industry. My friends advise me to take the film to Germany and save money on printing there!

It is an extraordinary position to find oneself placed in by one's own Government. Producing concerns and film-printers should combine to press the Government to abolish this tax—at least so far as British producing firms are concerned.

Everywhere we have been our reception has been remarkably cordial and in connection with this, I cannot speak too highly of the kindnesses we received in Granada. My party became the most popular figures in that picturesque city; the people there were delighted to find that we were not the haughty and disdainful creatures they saw masquerading as "English" in American films. The Spaniards are extremely democratic and much appreciated the way our party entered into the life of Granada.

If any of my friends here go to Granada, I should be delighted to give them an introduction to Señor Don José Martin, Director of the Sierra Nevada Film Company. Señor Martin, who speaks English, is one of the most practical men in the business; he thoroughly understands the camera, and has written most useful pamphlets on the effect of the snowcapped mountains on the photographic light in Andalusia. No cameraman visiting these parts should fail to get into touch with this able and extraordinary kind friend to the English. I should like to take this opportunity, with the Editor's permission, of thanking him publicly, also his friends, Señores Torres, Guglieri, Carillo, Luque, and several others who rendered us many kindnesses.

To revert to "Broken Sand." The leads are Annette Benson and Miles Mander—and I don't think they have done better work than in this picture.

We have some splendid fight scenes. Mander and I had a fight in the Atlas mountains which took us a whole day. I had a fine time. It began by his pulling me from my horse to the ground. I then tried to run away. So he blacked my eye and knocked me down. I then caught him by the legs and knocked his head against a boulder, after which we tore each others clothes. Next he punched my jaw; I therefore dislocated his thumb, and he finally knocked me out. When they came to pick me up and paint "blood" all over my face for the close-up, they found the real thing there!

Much as I enjoyed it, I'm thankful we haven't to retake this scene.

This is not the only fighting in the film. Annette Benson throws rocks at me down a precipice. Very viciously too. I thought she had gone mad. And she has a deadly aim. In another part Mander puts up a fight against five wiry Moors.

Getting the Focus

IT is now over three months since the last of the Founder Members of the Kinema Club were enrolled, and during that time the Club has become one of the seven wonders of the film world. It has become a haven and sanctuary to many artistes. It has been a supreme antidote to the depressed spirit that seemed an inevitable result of the slump period. Artistes who would otherwise have walked the streets disappointed and despairful have been able to enjoy the comfort and companionship of the Club. And their spirits were cheered and their hopes revived, until many are now saying: "How could we have done without it." It is impossible to compute the amount of good that the Club has done to the profession and to members of the profession.

* * *

AND now we are staggered to learn that a large number of Founder Members still owe their first year's subscription. For three months they have been prepared to enjoy the benefits of a Club that is kept open at the expense of others. Some of these defaulters, we can imagine, are genuinely financially embarrassed and have probably explained this to the Executive Committee. On the other hand, there are members who could easily afford to pay their subscription ten times over and yet do not pay it once. We are amazed at the leniency of the Executive and feel that unless the Executive wishes to earn the hearty disapproval of the members it should take drastic action at once. The names of the defaulting members should be posted. They should be given seven days in which to pay their dues, and then if these are unpaid they should be called upon to resign and notified that they can only be re-elected at the increased subscription and not as Founder Members.

* * *

THE whole position is farcical. People as a rule only become "Founder Members" in order to support a new venture. And yet some members' idea of support is to take advantage of the comfort and facilities provided by other members who are not lacking in the elementals of common decency, in that they have paid their dues. As it is, every decent member will be afraid that he is lunching at the same table with a member who is so backboneless as to usurp privileges to which he is not entitled. The Executive must act quickly and forcibly—better to have 200 members who pay than a membership roll made large by a number of deadheads.'

¶ To keep on slogging is not the most inspiring task in life: it is usually preferable to make a brilliant spurt and so win the prize.

But to keep slogging along and jogging along secures something that is even better than the prize; that is the joy of the race. For very often the most successful people are those who are most bitterly disillusioned. It will be found that it is not the prize that matters: it is the race.

Q When tempted mentally to rebel against the monotone of existence remember that there is a certain consolation in the fray that is absent in the shouts of victory.

THE position of British products in the markets of the world is improving each week. But "we haven't done our best thing yet." There is a fine opportunity ahead for our national output and in order to grasp this there must be eliminated every handicap that now operates to the disadvantage of British films. On previous occasions we have pointed out the handicap of poor acting, the handicap of faulty direction, and the handicap of unsuitable stories. This week we direct attention to a technical aspect of the problem.

* * *

ONE of the boasts of British producing concerns is that British cinematography is on as high a plane as—and sometimes higher than—American photography. The work of our cameraman is the work of the world's best. But after director, artiste, scenarist, cameraman and studio staff have put their best into a picture, there is a big risk of all this good work being wasted. For very often, when the negative goes to be printed it is so grossly mishandled and so carelessly treated that all the high photographic values are irrevocably lost and the work of director and artiste minimised, if not destroyed.

* * *

ALL this is due to the principle that obtains and which is known as "trade printing." The negative—every inch of which the cameraman knows, including the exposure of each shot and the lighting of each scene—is sent away from the studio and handed over to the tender mercies of a firm of film printers. And when the finished print returns no one can say whether its poverty-stricken quality is due to faulty camera work or an overheated developing bath. But, no matter who is to blame, when the Trade goes to the Trade show it reads "Photography by Blank Blank." And poor Blank Blank gets roundly slated by the critics for poor photography which is probably due to careless laboratory work at the "trade printers." This is the foundation of Charlie Chaplin's just criticism when he said: "Your laboratory work is bad." And we are convinced that our pictures are not going to get a fair chance in the world's markets until the possibility of the good work of a cameraman being spoiled by the printer is removed. The trade printers must be forced to improve their work; failing this all film producing companies will have to fit up their own printing establishments (as some have) and staff it with skilled men. If this latter course is pursued, then every cameraman should become an adept at film printing and do this himself.

OUR INTERNATIONAL ART

by EVELYN BRENT.

Since leaving the United States just on two years ago (for what I intended should be a holiday, and has since proved to be a period of strenuous film work), I have played in films in England, Holland, France, and Spain, and, compared with work in the American studios, I have found my experiences of considerable interest.

In the first place, the atmosphere in which one works in the various countries is totally different. American studios are wonderfully organised—the lighting is far in advance of any I have seen in any other country—the comfort and well-being of the artistes is studied in every way, and as one spends the greater part of one's life in the studio when working in a film, this goes a long way towards good work from the players.

My first experience of film acting in England was after I had appeared in a stage production. I was offered the part, and as I thought it would be a fresh experience for me to play in a studio on this side, I accepted. Naturally, the contrast between the American and English methods of production was great.

Here it seems that the director has the work of ten people on his shoulders. He selects his own story, in some cases he writes the scenario, he casts his film, he gives instructions for sets, he directs the production—with little or no assistance from anyone but the ordinary studio staff. If he has an assistant, nothing can be done without the director's consent.

This over-working of the director is, I think, one of the reasons why the detail work of the English film is seldom, if ever, up to the American standard.

Another point which seems to me one which requires attention is the ridiculous speed with which the majority of British pictures are made. The director has his script completed on a Thursday, for instance, on the following Monday he is expected to have cast the film, saturated himself in the atmosphere of the play, and have his artistes at work on the first scene. Seldom, if ever, are all the leading artistes supplied with a script, so that they, too, may get into the atmosphere of the story about to be filmed.

However, I have stayed a long time in England working in film studios, and I like the work. I like the studio people, and somehow I feel I would like to do a little towards helping the British film to compete with the American and foreign productions. I shall look back with pleasure on the days I have spent working under the arc lights (generally all too few in number) of the English studios—but always I shall sigh, "Poor British director!" and marvel that the films he directs are as good as they are.

In Holland I found that the quaint quietude of the little town where the studio is situated had a tremendous influence on my work. The customs of the people interested me, and to work with local Dutch artistes (as we did in many scenes, although the leading parts were interpreted by artistes from other countries), was amusing and enjoyable.

France, of course, knows as much about the film business as any other country, and, save for the fact that the language offered just a little difficulty, working in a French studio is much the same as working in an American plant.

My experiences in Spain were the most delightful of all during my work for British companies. In order to obtain the correct atmosphere for "The Spanish Jade," the company travelled to Seville. Here we were transplanted from the cold dreariness of a London winter to the warmth and sunshine of Spain. We lived our parts—we did not act them. We were surrounded by the true atmosphere of the film, with the result that instead of being work, our parts became a very real pleasure. Every detail was correct—there was no "making do," and I felt my part.

Of course, the trip cost the company far more than it would have done to erect studio sets in imitation of the real thing—but wasn't it worth while? Doesn't it stand to reason that everyone can give far better work if they can work in natural surroundings? and instead of travelling to the location in the studio through dreary London streets, as a great many British directors (admittedly through no fault of their own, but merely because of cheese-paring methods) would have us do, we journeyed through streets and country in which the story was set. From the time we left our hotel we started to live the film story, with the sun blazing down on us, and the chattering of the Spaniards in our ears. Working under such conditions makes you give of your best work—if you are an artiste you just can't help it.

"The Spanish Jade" was made by an American director. If only British financiers would give British directors the opportunity to do likewise, then British films would be welcomed by America.

THE TRAGEDY OF A SHORT FILM

by RUPERT CREW.

A little time ago one of the largest and most enterprising British producing companies presented at its Trade show a one-reel subject of an unusual kind. It was adapted from a short story by a brilliant fiction writer. This little picture was in every way excellent. The strikingly original story of laughter and tears gripped from the beginning and sustained a breathless interest to the very end, when a sudden, unexpected climax swiftly and cleverly crowned the artistic effect of this brilliant little effort at originality.

Here, indeed, we had the ideal short film. And here, also, was a picture which was not only novel and unusual in conception, but sure of wide appeal, simply because it was funny as well as sensible, human and entertaining. In a word, it was a break-away from the American slap-stick, of which the kinema-going public is so tired.

You may well now inquire how many exhibitors have since rushed to book this little masterpiece? It proved only to be a tragedy of enterprise: for up to the moment of writing this article, not a single exhibitor has inquired for it.

At the Trade show of this film, somebody, apparently an exhibitor, sat beside me. I had no idea who he was or what theatre he represented. He watched me with a smirking cynical grin applaud the little feature, then he turned round to me, the end of a cheap cigar between his teeth, and exclaimed: "Too good for 'em! Too good for 'em. Won't understand it!"

And yet exhibitors and constantly complaining that directors are not enterprising enough! Enterprise is lacking in showmanship, not in production. The average exhibitor to-day seems tragically narrow-minded. He shuns anything in the nature of an experiment. He wonders why his theatre is often practically empty. He forgets that lack of novelty in his programs keeps his patrons away or sends them elsewhere. He will never restore his war-time patronage unless he employs common-sense. He will never draw "crowds" unless he caters for all classes. All sorts and conditions of people visit the kinemas to-day, and it is imperative that all tastes should be borne in mind.

As Compton Mackenzie has pointed out, long films do not appeal to everyone, and rather than sit through two long features, many people, who would otherwise visit the kinemas often, stop away. For these individuals alone, the short film would be welcomed if artistically produced. Are we never to see the world's masterpieces in short fiction pictured in one or two reels?

The films lack very little to-day beyond co-operation between producers and exhibitors. Not until they work together in complete harmony, shall we hear less about "the failure of the films" and "empty theatres"! Enterprise in production is useless without enterprise in showmanship.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Matheson Lang returns to the screen in a few week's time to play for Stoll in "Dick Turpin's Ride to York," which is a screen version of Harrison Ainsworth's book "Rookwood," and which is to be made under the direction of Maurice Elvey. Lang is becoming quite a familiar figure in the British studio nowadays, having played for Alliance and Thompson quite recently. Perhaps "Carnival" was his best piece of screen work, but as Dick Turpin he should score a big success. This, by the way, is to be another super production and we are always ready to welcome super productions, which mean more work for the artiste and, if well done, help to advance the Industry.

I attended a lunch given by Harley Knoles to pressmen and friends at the Royal Automobile Club, on Friday of last week, and was particularly interested in some of the particulars Knoles gave about his latest production, "The Bohemian Girl." It is a theme which has been a great favourite of his for years, and during the last six years he has had only one really great ambition; it was to see "The Bohemian Girl" in screen form. His wish has now been granted, and I do not think we will have to wait long for the Trade show.

At the same lunch, Walter Wanger had a few words to say. He mentioned that Harley Knowles had approached him previous to Alliance, with "The Bohemian Girl," but he had turned the subject down, not because he did not think it would be a success, but because he believed that in England we should produce pictures of English life and customs, which to the American market is more acceptable.

Writing from Paris, where he is making a picture for Autora, George Caliga says: "I was happy to see Rene Plaissetty at the Gaumont Studios here. He is directing a fine picture, and has now gone to the South of France for the last shots. He is an excellent director and much liked in France." Personally, I always thought that Rene was one of the best directors that had ever come from America to England, and hope to see him again soon in a British studio. Caliga, I gather, is signing another contract to play juvenile lead.

When "Mr. Studley Revokes" was produced by the Interlude Players at the King's Hall, Covent Garden, on Sunday last, Bryan Powley, who will be well remembered as the single gentleman in "The Old Curiosity Shop," was seen in the leading part of Studley. This is Powley's first appearance on the London stage since returning from a long Canadian tour with Marie Löhr in "Her Destiny," "The Voice from the Minaret" and "The Marionettes," in which he played leading parts. Now he is back in London he expects to make a re-appearance in films, for he was obliged to relinquish a part in the Stuart Blackton production when he sailed for Canada. Powley's stage experience covers a period of many years, and he has played in films for the London, Neptune, Davidson, Broad-west, Gaumont and Welsh-Pearson companies.

Before taking up film work Lt.-Col. R. M. English, D.S.O., had spent the greater part of his life in the Army. Educated at Wellington College and Sandhurst, he joined the King's Shropshire Light Infantry in 1895. He served through the South African War, and spent five years in India, and then served again throughout the recent war, in which he gained the D.S.O. and the French Croix de Guerre. From 1918-1919 he was Provost-Marshal of London, after which he retired with the rank of Lieut.-Colonel. In 1920 he turned his attentions to film work, and appeared in a very small part in a British film. Since that time he has played leading parts in "The Broken Road," "The Four Feathers," "The Hound of the Baskervilles," "The Rotters," "The Lost Leader," "The Truants" and "Dangerous Lies." For four years previous to the war Mr. English had taken a deep interest in, and had acted with, a number of dramatic societies around Liverpool, so he was not altogether without "previous experience."

Elaborate presentations of "The Glorious Adventure" will be made in New York and Paris within the next few weeks. On April 16 this will have its American premiere at the Capitol Theatre, New York's largest and most palatial kinema, and near the same time the Paris premiere of this picture will take place. It will be shown first at the Gaumont Hippodrome, the largest kinema in the French capital, and later at two of the leading Parisian picture houses, one of which is the Madeleine, before its general release.

In Walter Forde's next comedy he is to have the oldest motor car in London as one of the chief comedians. The car is now undergoing extensive repairs and is being made as safe as possible. In riding such a car, Walter takes a great deal of risk, for it is liable to go up in pieces at any minute. Still the public has to be amused, and we must hope for the best.

Challis Sanderson returned to Master Films this week, to direct some of the new "Tense Moments from Great Operas." He was, of course, originally connected with this company and directed one or two of its successes, including "The Scallywag" and "The Law Divine." Then he went over to Artistic, for whom he made the successful comedy "Monty Works the Wires," which was sold in America. Later he acted as assistant director to Stuart Blackton on "The Glorious Adventure." He is now hard at work on a one-reel version of "Faust."

SUPER PHILOSOPHY

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

"Nuit Macabre."

"WHAT a perfect evening," I said, as I greeted the Super.

It was, too. The moon was picking out London's streets in black and silver; a little breeze had sprung up to lighten the heavy heat of a June day; the saloon-bar was choked with the steamy fumes of stale beer and rancid tobacco smoke. A perfect evening!

"Is it?" said the Super gloomily. "I 'adn't noticed!"

"On a night like this," I rhapsodised, "one should be lying on some cliff-edge gazing out to sea. She—there must be a She, of course—should be at one's side. The silver path of the moon leading you both to the realms of Romance."

"I don't altogether 'old with the sea," said the Super. "Too salty—seems to get into the beer even."

I took the hint. There was a short silence.

"Gawd! I wanted that one," said the Super, as he put down his tankard.

"You are not a lover of Romance, I fear," I suggested.

"Meanin' girls and sad sea waves, and such like?" inquired the Super.

I nodded.

"It don't bear looking into," continued the Super, gazing absent-mindedly into his empty tankard. I hastened to rectify the mistake, and he went on.

"I've never 'ad much truck with girls. In my experience there's only two sorts of girls. One sort thinks it low to go into a public 'ouse—the other sort don't, and it's always your shout. The first sort's dis'heartening, the second's ruinous. As for the sad sea waves—I don't reckon sitting on the beach looking at 'em is goin' ter cheer 'em up.

"Talking about the sea, though, d'you know Rottingdean?"

I nodded.

"I 'ad an experience there once with a pal o' mine, Jim Darth, which I 'spose you'd call Romantic. Jim didn't though, and 'e was romantic, 'eaven knows. If anything with a skirt on looked round to 'ail a tram-car, Jim would think it was Venus, and follow 'er for miles. I've known that man spot a bird through a bar window and leave 'is beer. That'll show you.

"Well, we was busking at the time. We 'ad a portable 'armonium on a barrow. Jim played it and sang baritone. I pushed it and did the comics. We'd done eighteen miles over the Downs that day, and got to Rottingdean latish in the evening. Gawd! those Downs!" The Super spoke feelingly. "Lovely rolling country you'd call it, I suppose. You try rolling a portable 'armonium over it for eighteen miles and see 'ow you like it. Eighteen miles, mind you, and never met a soul who took the slightest interest in music.

"We gets to Rottingdean just in time to give a show to a deaf boatman, three children and a blasé dog. Then with a joint capital of sevenpence 'apenny, came the question of supplies.

"Well, in those days you could buy it for tuppence, and at eleven o'clock there we was pushing that damned 'armonium along the deserted beach looking for a empty bathing-machine to spend the night in. All of a sudden I spots a wooden shed standing all by itself under the sea wall. The door's open, and we pops in. There's a little square window with a streak of moonlight shining through, and under the window is a widish bench standing a couple of feet off the ground. In a corner is a heap of old sacking, and a fishing net or two.

"Jim had the bench—'im being senior partner—and I takes a couple of sacks and a corner. As soon as we'd comfortably settled 'e says, 'If only we 'ad a couple of birds 'ere. I wouldn't mind stopping on a bit.'

"'Aint walking all day enough for you, without starting flying at night,' I sez sarcastic.

"'Oh, you got no Romance,' 'e says—same as you toid me just now.

"'I got a blister on my 'eel,' I answers, 'so I got enough to go on with without that. Now, for Gawd's sake, let me get to sleep before you start snoring,' I says.

"It was a perfect evening—or you'd 'ave called it that, I reckon. The moonlight shining through the window on to the floor—like the prompt turn on a starving 'eroine—the swish, swish of the shingle as the tide came up, and in a few minutes I was dead-oh! I'm a light sleeper, and once I seemed to 'ear the creak of the door and shuffling footsteps; but after eighteen miles with that barrow it would 'ave taken more than that to make me turn over. I just put it down to imagination and slept right on.

"Presently, I was woke up with a vengeance, though. It was Jim screaming. 'Arthur!' he yelled. 'For Gawd's sake! There's something in the bed with me. 'Elp! 'elp! It's got its 'and on my face, and it's all cold and wet.' Then there was a scuffling noise and something rolled on to the floor with a squelchy thud, and I was on my feet. The thing that had fallen off the bench had rolled into the moonlight, and I saw what it was. Jim saw, too, and 'e was cowering into the wall with his hands over 'is face, shrieking.

"Well, 'e'd asked for company," mused the Super, "and 'e got it. Oh, 'e got it all right. She must have been a fine woman, too, in 'er day; but I reckon she'd been in the water for a week or more, and she 'adn't worn well. I found out afterwards she'd been picked up by some fishermen who'd brought her in our hut to wait till morning, pore thing. Jim and me lying in the shadow, they 'adn't noticed us, and they'd just laid her down gently at Jim's side and 'opped it. Then 'e must 'ave moved—or she did—anyhow, it upset Jim's nerves. 'E kep' on 'aving nightmare—talking about 'alf a face with no eyes.' What with that and moth getting into the 'armonium, a few days later the tour was abandoned."

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"The Little Brother of God."

Stoll—Starring Valia, Victor McLaglen, Fred Raynham and Alec Fraser—Supported by Robert Vallis, Bertie Wright, Harry Worth, Varies Amiel Nichawa and Lionelle Howard—Directed by F. Martin Thornton—Scenario by Leslie H. Gordon—Photography by Percy Strong.

IN choosing "The Little Brother of God" as a suitable picture for screening, Stoll sets its director a difficult task. It is not easy to reproduce the grandeur of the Canadian backwoods in England, and Martin Thornton could not be expected to do the impossible.

There has never been an attempt to make a full length picture of Canadian life in England before. Prior to this, pictures of Canada have all been flashbacks, or just small episodes; in this respect "The Little Brother of God" is the best that has so far been attempted.

The story gets monotonous, and is void of incident. The object seems to be that when you have no further use for a character you have him shot, and then introduce another character to take his place. So the film goes on with periodical shootings, just to relieve the uninteresting story.

Victor McLaglen gives a very fine performance, and the only really convincing one of the whole cast.

Valia has been badly cast; she is suited for a more dramatic role; the part of Helen demands no histrionic ability, and Valia is wasted in such a role.

Fred Raynham is far from convincing; his mad frenzy is overdone, and all through the other scenes he reminds one of the typical stage villain, who tugs at his moustache and says "Ha! Ha!"

Lionelle Howard's performance is poor.

Bertie Wright is good as the little Frenchman, and Alec Fraser makes a somewhat anaemic-looking hero, but his acting is quite up to standard.

Varies Amiel Nichawa makes a fine Indian, and is a clever actor.

Robert Vallis does well what little he has to do.

The story is a bad one for screening purposes, but has been well adapted in a straightforward manner. The continuity is good.

Percy Strong's photography is excellent and considerably enhances the production. The sub-titling is a clever bit of work. Some of the scenes were a trifle dark, due, no doubt, to a dark print.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: As good as is possible.

LEADS: Victor McLaglen is very fine, but Valia and Fred Raynham are not good.

SUPPORTS: Good.

LITERARY: Bad story fairly well adapted.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Admirable, with some fine sub-titling effects.

LIGHTING: Excellent.

INTERIORS: Convincing.

EXTERIORS: Best possible in the circumstances.

PICTORIAL COMPOSITION

Theory is looked upon, generally, as some very high idea of an art, very remote from practice, and only intelligible to those who are initiated. But theory only comes from practice, and is the direct consequence of it and actual observations from concrete facts. The study of these consequences has led to the evolution of laws; in fact, theory is practice working under ideal conditions.

As conditions change, so does the theory. This is why rules which apply to one art do not apply necessarily to other arts, and, if picture-making can be included with painting, or drawing, or photographing, the rules which are true for these arts have to be modified for the new art, which is affected by movement.

Since movement is represented on a plane, the idea of balance is altered, but it is nevertheless essential that any picture should be harmonious and restful to the eye.

It is a very good thing that, for the moment, scenes do not stay long enough on the screen to be criticised, so far as composition is concerned, by the public, otherwise defects which are hardly noticed would become apparent; up to now we have accustomed ourselves to consider movement more than any pictorial effect, but should the technique of film producing alter, we would have to consider more and more the composition of the "shots."

It is quite possible to make one part of the screen more conspicuous by judicious lighting, and it is possible to make one point in the set, or a person, more prominent by moving slightly the camera one side or the other or up or down. For instance, if you have two artistes talking and the scene is cut with sub-titles, while close-ups are used by most directors, it would be just as effective to keep the two personages in sight, while the prominence given to one or the other would indicate sufficiently who is talking, and this without diffusing or softening the appearance of the other artiste.

Sometime, a greater and more impressive effect would be obtained in a picture by changing the angle of the "shot"—a matter of one or two inches makes all the difference; the height of the camera also alters the perspective of the picture, and should be varied nearly for every position of the camera.

When artistes are moving in a set, or in an exterior, it is nearly always in a fairly long shot. Then the set can become the base of the composition, and when the artiste becomes the point of interest above anything else, as in medium shots, there is less displacement of the body and the difficulty is greater to get an harmonious composition.

Finding the best angle and the best height naturally takes time, but the result is worth the extra bit of trouble, and though it is not always possible to define what has caused the improvement, the pleasing aspect of the picture well repays for the amount of care and time spent.

I have noticed that some artistes seem to get rather impatient at the delay entailed; they forget that the time which is used for trying to obtain perfection is not always wasted. Some do realise that it is all of the best; but even then they do not go as far as realising that the cameraman is anxious that they should not wait too long, but is in the meantime intent on getting absolutely the best shot that he can possibly obtain.

A bust very often is taken dead centre on the oblong of the picture—a position which would leave slightly more space on the side where the eyes are looking would certainly look better, and, as for the "shots" where the eyes are nearer their own side, the effect is awful, and should always be avoided.

It is bad composition to have the shoulders and head of a man standing motionless with, for background, a full landscape, for all connection between the man and the background is lost; so it would be, though not to such a great extent, but still unpleasant to the eye, if the feet of the man, at a certain distance, were cut, while the background would be a street, for instance, with a large house behind and the sky over the roof. It is only a matter of taking the camera lower down. The background is nearly exactly the same, but the man stands in full, or fills up more of the picture, which is more pleasing to look at and logical to the eye.

Many observations can be made with regard to composition, and it is impossible to mention every possible form, but another instance is of an artiste sitting, in a close-up. The picture will look much better if part of the seat is shown on the screen, even the slightest suggestion of it gives the picture a greater aspect of stability and solidity than with the seat entirely out of sight.

Another way of considering composition is with regard to light and shade; such a scene which will look perfect with a daylight effect will be quite out of balance if photographed from the same position with a night effect. The luminous point should not be in the centre, or, if in the centre, some dark object should give more weight on one side, and this object should not be vertical, so that there would be more black on one side than on the other.

All this makes a study in itself. Observations from the old masters, from prints, engravings, photographs, and especially sketches drawn very boldly from these paintings or reproductions would help to get a better idea of composition.

There is no need to be an artist to make those sketches, a very rough outline, and, later, a very broad shading will go a long way towards training the eye of the cameraman; they will oblige the memory to work and retain shapes and forms which otherwise would soon be forgotten. When a work of art is good, there is no shame in trying to realise on the film what the artist realised on canvas or paper, or even in stone.

Nature is a good teacher: stand in front of a tree and move about until you find a good picture, then move again and find another point of view, with the same tree in the foreground, say, for instance, two-thirds of the trunk showing on one side of your composition, the slope of the ground going up to the trunk, or a big root tearing the ground, and the beginning of a big bough at the top. Then, from further away, more on one side or the other, the same tree, with a small space between the side of the picture, more foreground and the leaves hanging down and, with a bush on the other side of the frame, making more of a mask for the landscape behind, and then, through that kind of opening, try to get a good line of trees, or a river, with hills in the distance, or an old cottage, and it is surprising how the slightest change in the position of the eye of the observer makes a great difference in the aspect of the landscape.

A simple piece of black cardboard, cut with an opening in the proportion of one by three-quarters, would give ample opportunity of composing pictures without using any camera at all, and this is what we used to do when we did not want to carry with us our painting outfit, box, easel and canvas, but simply to study the lines of the landscape and the harmony of the masses. A careful training of the eye will help to work quicker and obtain more easily this harmony of lines and light and shade that we all strive to obtain in our work.

BOUQUETS.

My Motion Picture Studio is delivered to me every Saturday afternoon by my news-agent, Smith's Bookstall at Teddington Station, and as they show it about a couple of hours at my request before it comes round, I think I am doing you a good turn. I am interested in the Club and I am interested in the STUDIO—it is the only English paper we have got. My son sends me the motion picture papers from America, and not a word ever appears in their columns about any English actor or any English film, yet every paper on this side, until yours came out, is packed full of American stuff; even our dailies.

I do not go to the pictures often (too much like a busman's holiday to me), but I went last week to see "The Knight Errant." It is the finest specimen of photography I have ever seen; and at the same show there was a picture taken in Gawd's own country in Gawd's own sun spot, California, and it was no: to be compared with it, and yet I have not seen a word about this picture in any English paper. I think we take this treatment lying down.—R. JUDD GREEN.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—It is only fair to explain that the reason that "The Knight Errant" was not reviewed by the Kine Weekly and the STUDIO is that Stoll did not Trade show this picture, but included it in a series that was booked direct to the exhibitors.

PUTTING "MOVE" INTO "MOVIE"

Florence Turner waxes anecdotal and reminiscent.

HAVING started my stage career at the advanced age of three, it is indeed small wonder that all my interest has always been with things theatrical.

My very first appearance was made under amusing and surprising conditions. The play was "The Romany Rye," and I was to enter the scene with a number of other children, merely stand there and leave at a signal from the manager while the leading players were speaking their lines.

Did I do this?

I did not!

I proceeded to leave the other children, walk down straight to the footlights and make a few remarks to the audience, to their huge delight and the infinite disgust of the star, whose pompous "entrance" I had utterly ruined.

It was with the greatest difficulty that your small humble servant was persuaded to leave the stage and allow the play to proceed. It is all too evident that "crowd work" did not appeal.

After eight years as a child-player (having during this period been taught by a private tutor my school lessons at home), my mother sent me to a real day school at the age of eleven, thinking it time for me to mingle with other children. This I severely resented, as I loved my stage work with an intensity that only the born and bred player can understand.

The school years were only made bearable by my frequent flights into play-writing and acting, which were earnestly indulged in.

I remember clearly one lunch-hour when the teacher, hearing piercing shrieks emanating from our schoolroom, rushed in to find me strangling one of the other pupils with great gusto. When my unfortunate co-player, purple-faced and gasping, was finally torn from my grasp, I was indignantly asked to explain the outrage.

My reply, given with great dignity, was to the effect that we had been doing the great strangling scene from "Othello," with myself as the Moor!

"And," said I, with a real fierce and Othello-like scowl and pointing dramatically to Desdemona, "take her away! She's no actress! Shrieking just because I choked her! A real actress never hollers, no matter what happens to her in a scene!"

Which piece of intelligence, strangely enough, did not prove the riot of enthusiasm one might think.

Many were the long hours I spent in punishment through being caught giving impersonations of my teachers.

At the age of sixteen, feeling quite fed-up with school life and dying to return to my beloved acting on a real stage again, I appeared in my first "grown-up" part with your great and only Sir Henry Irving.

It was during his last American tour, and having read an "advert." that supers were wanted for "Robespierre," I courageously presented myself at the stage-door quite unknown to my family.

Several girls had been "tried out" to lead the wild mob against Robespierre, but they had not pleased the super-master, as they lacked the required fire and force of the revolutionary woman. After much pleading on my part (I'd been told to go home three times, being judged too young and small), the super-master finally allowed me a hearing.

Yours truly tore into the scene without any delay whatsoever. The air was rent with my piercing cries and shrieks of hatred against Robespierre, and the unfortunate man who impersonated Sir Henry at rehearsal had to be literally dragged from me, as I scratched and clawed and cursed at him.

I got the engagement.

Later I played with American stars, and it was in the spring of 1907, while leading woman with Charles Bradshaw in a music-hall sketch, that an Englishwoman named Mabel Crawley suggested my doing film work.

"You can make such awful faces, Flo," she remarked. "I should think you'd be rather successful."

I went to the Vitagraph at once, was immediately engaged, and remained there for six years.

Those were the wonderful days when J. Stuart Blackton, Albert Smith, one director, one scenic artist, one property man and myself comprised the Vitagraph stock company, and put our shoulders to the wheel and helped to put the move in "movie."

We had no cameraman in 1907—Mr. Smith "took" the scenes and Mr. Blackton the "stills."

It was a great life!

The novelty of being able to portray a new character every day was of the utmost fascination to me and gave me a schooling in make-up that has proven invaluable. At nineteen I delighted in being a very old sweet lady in the a.m. and a wicked imp of a street gamin in the p.m.

Yes, we sometimes did two films a day!

Of course, I took my life and health in my hands many times, as dangerous stunts in those days were undertaken by the players themselves, their being no accommodating "doubles" to take 40-ft. falls from second-storey windows or to drop gracefully into a freezing river in January.

I was nearly drowned twice—caught in two fearful fire scenes, and being hung over a cliff 650 ft. above sea-level.

Truly a pleasant feeling, this!

A most uncomfortable finish had I fallen. The rocks were rather jagged, you see.

Once I was thrown completely over a horse's head, and dragged from under the wild and frightened animal's hoofs by the hair which, fortunately, was then very long—or I'd not be wearing any face to speak of now.

In "Kenilworth," as Amy Robsart, I was called upon to fall through the trapdoor to my death. The stage-hands built the door much too short, the result being that I had to sort of hunch myself up in order to make a successful drop.

Further interest was added to the scene by the fact that said doors were hung upon a couple of dozen enormous nails as long as your hand that bristled forth in glistening array as I fell through.

And not one touched me.

It is not exactly conducive to one's best work to be kept in the dark during a scene of this nature as to which eye is about to be gouged out. The uncertainty was most alarming.

I left the Vitagraph in the spring of 1913 coming to England and organising my own film corporation named the Turner Films, Ltd. With the help of such eminent and efficient directors as Henry Edwards and Larry Trimble, we produced, among other films, "Far From the Madding crowd," "The Murdoch Trial," "Door Steps," "East is East," "A Welsh Singer," and "My Old Dutch."

The latter film, bought by the Ideal Co., has been re-issued every year since August, 1915, and been shown in over 3,000 theatres. Which proves that the "heart" story of simple folk has far more appeal than the elaborate spectacular drama, for no film of the latter type from America can point with pride to such a record.

As most of the British public know, the war successfully broke up my company, and I of necessity returned to my own country, but determined to be in England again as soon as ever possible.

So here I am again, glad, and, oh! most happy, to be in the country where its people have always made me so heartily welcome, and hoping never to leave it again. In closing I can only say most sincerely that coming back to Great Britain has just meant coming home to me.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

"No. 9" was the scene of one of the most enjoyable week-ends that have ever been spent by film folks in town. First there was the Frolic on Saturday night. As Rex Davies smilingly said: "We started by calling them 'Hops,' then we called 'em 'Dances,' and now each Saturday night it is a Ball." A record number of couples took the floor, and Rex talks of commandeering another floor.

Then on Sunday a fine company of members sat and shrieked with laughter at the brilliant wit of Fred Groves, as an old-fashioned chairman of an Old Time Concert. An excellent program was rendered by a company of real artistes, who are to be congratulated on the quality of their performances and thanked for their kindness in producing the evening's entertainment.

The secretary tells me that he has in hand a scheme for transforming the roof of the club into an open-air tea and concert room. The idea is to put plants up there and little tables dotted about. Here could be held concerts, whist drives and dances. My word! Our club will be the talk of the town. The Secretary has examined the roof and finds that it is ideally suited, being asphalted.

A Distributing Corps has been organised in connection with the tickets for the Kinema Club Carnival. John Payne is the treasurer of the fund, and Billie Preston the hon. organiser.

Greater activities in the matter of sports are in evidence. The Secretary explains that he has now formed the Sports Club, and appointed committees to deal with cricket, tennis, football, boxing and fencing, billiards and bowls and cards. Members wishing to join should communicate with the Secretary at once.

An appeal is made to members to inform the Secretary if they know of a suitable sports ground that could be acquired.

To-morrow being Good Friday, the hours usually operating on Sunday will be enforced. At night a "Go-As-You-Please Dance" will take place (the title is self-explanatory).

On Saturday there will be the usual dance, and on Sunday night a three-minute billiard handicap will be held in the billiard room. Already 60 entries have been secured. Prizes will be given.

In the last issue of the STUDIO there was a "Do You Know" query with reference to Harry Worth's secret. It now leaks out that this secret has reference to "The Kinema Club Jazz Band," that makes its debut at the Good Friday dance.

Congratulations to one of the founder members—Eric Albury—who was married to Gladys Vernon this Wednesday. The bride is well known on the stage and screen.

HINTS FOR SCENARISTS

To be successful a photoplay must be logical and realistic. Consequently, motivation is one of the important fundamentals of screen drama. The poorly motivated story must inevitably be unconvincing. The law of "cause and effect" governs photodrama, just as it governs the world at large. To paraphrase a popular advertisement, "there must be a reason" for everything your characters do. It is well to remember, however, that motivation which is forced, or obvious, will defeat its own ends. Do not "drag in" incidents merely to bolster up an otherwise weak situation. Test each and every motivating incident by asking yourself not, "Could such a thing happen?" but, "Would such a thing happen?" Many things which are possible are far from probable.

be unusual in themselves. The motion picture in which the characters seem unreal, products of shadowland only, will not meet with public favour.

Don't throw your rejected stories away. Oft-times, the discouraged photoplay writer, following repeated rejection of a cherished manuscript, will consign it to the fire-place as an impossibility upon which he wishes to waste no more time. Granting that he may be correct in this opinion, there is always the chance that the discarded scenario may contain material which, when the writer has had more training and experience, may be worked over and incorporated into a really successful drama. Poor, indeed, is the film story that does not possess at least one or two valuable bits of material: and, as often happens, there may be a "plot germ" lurking in the rejected film-play of yours which, in the years to come, will well repay you for the labour spent in revamping it.

The wise photoplaywright will make no attempt to appeal directly to the emotions of his audience. At all times, any such appeal must be made indirectly through the characters of the picture itself. Let the audience gain emotional thrill from the reaction upon the actors of the situations in your story, and the drama will seem more realistic. Thrill gained by trickery—by deceiving the spectator—is bound to reflect unfavourably. (From the Photodramatist.)

CLUB CLOSE-UPS

by DAVID ROBERTSON

NO. III.—MALCOLM TOD.

Being the baby's bachelor in "The Bachelor's Baby," it is only right that Malcolm Tod should indulge in nursery rhymes. Evidently the rhyme in question is "Baa, baa, black sheep, have you any wool" (the first two words being spelled "B-A-R").

While it is best, in moulding screen characters, to exaggerate them slightly, by emphasising certain straits upon which the drama might depend, never lose sight of the fact that they must appear to your audience as human beings. Even though you select a drab, commonplace person as your lead, be sure to endow him with sufficient "humanness" to make him appear real so that the spectator will be interested in following his career. The persons of the play must always be interesting although some of them may not

The Day of Exposure.

IN view of the articles which we have printed in the columns of The Motion Picture Studio ever since the inception of the paper it ought to be unnecessary to explain our attitude towards so-called Kinema Schools. However, having regard to a letter received by a reader who raises this point again, we take this opportunity of explaining our objections to these institutions. In the first place many of these establishments are only, at the most, superficially honest. Some of them indeed are flagrant swindles, and the day of their exposure is near at hand. They know this and their admiration for this journal, because of the part we are playing in the exposure, is well below zero. We have information of the care with which certain so-called schools are baiting traps for our undoing ; but the wily rascals at the head of these concerns must not forget the possibility of falling into their own traps.

The Art of Wangling.

ANOTHER objection is directed to the futility of these schools. They are incapable of performing 99 per cent. of their promises. Even those schools that "guarantee" every student a part in a film can only do so by a judicious use of the gentle Art of Wangling. We have had accounts in detail of the "casting" that takes place and it appears to be a proceeding that has a distinctly comic flavour if at bottom it were not so tragic! For the only result it produces is to confirm the screen-struck incompetents in their hopeless obsession that they are talented, and even if one in a hundred—which is doubtful—ever "makes good," even in a minor way, it is at the expense of much suffering and bitter disappointment on the part of the other ninety-nine. For it does not require an extensive knowledge of the inside of film work to prove that the "training" of such crude material cannot be of the slightest use in serious film work.

Another Venture.

AT the very best the result of these schools is to flood a glutted market with inexperienced crowd players. And this is one of the chief reasons for our opposition. Schools—as at present constituted—are entirely wrong in principle. They have no moral right to accept fees from the ignorant for alleged training well knowing that even if the “training” is at all successful the pupils will be thrown into a profession which is already painfully overcrowded by experienced artistes. It is for this reason that we are surprised that a gentleman of the professional reputation of Norman MacDonald should be ready to associate himself with yet another new school. The Amateur Film Production Agency has just been formed with

Q Every day and in every way things are getting better. There is an unmistakable movement in favour of a recovery in the profession.

And now The Brighter Day is about to dawn it is up to everyone to consecrate every passion and use every ounce of energy for the betterment of the profession and its Art. You may be inclined to imagine that what you, personally, do doesn't count one. But that is the line of thought of a person in senile decay. For it goes without saying that there can be no collective success without individual effort.

Q Which means to say that in your own way and after your own fashion YOU are required to contribute to the general weal.

Mr. MacDonald and George Leyton as the directors of productions, and the explanation given is that the "Academy" teaches film acting in all its aspects to those interested in this work from a purely amateur point of view and "with the primary object of encouraging and developing any latent talent for screen acting there may be among the amateurs in this country" in return for a fee of five guineas for six weeks' training.

Undercutting Artists.

WE are not concerned at this juncture with the claim that the Academy makes to the effect that pupils will be the artistes in a production "which, within a few weeks of completion will be shown at a leading picture theatre." We ask the promoters to name the "leading picture theatre" that has consented to show the "production." We should like to know. But we strongly object to the statement that "the Academy exists for the use of those interested in screen work with the inclination and ability to act for films but who are not anxious to and do not find it necessary to attempt to earn their living by this means." We italicise the sinister words: none knows better than Mr. MacDonald that a distinct disservice is being done to the profession by wealthy amateurs who "do not find it necessary to earn their living" by film work and are consequently able to undercut the professional artiste and who would be only too ready to black-leg if the professional artistes were ever forced to fight for their rights. The Academy says that it will only accept those who want "to undertake what is practically a hobby," and argues that this is the "exemplification of art for art's sake." All of which reads like the writings of Bun Kum in the Elysian Fields of Colney Hatch.

The Menace of a Hobby.

THIS "hobby" stunt is bad enough, and promoters argue that their main plan is to cater for those who want to spend money in order to indulge their hobby, but that is only half (at most) of the truth. For with delightful inconsistency the Academy adds that "it is, of course, hoped that the very valuable experience offered by the Academy may possibly lead to many of the pupils, so inclined, taking up the work professionally," and in anticipation of this it explains that "for those who wish to carry film acting beyond the amateur stage there is an advisory bureau which is prepared to place them in communication with film directors." And the Academy people must be fully aware of the fact that these "gifted amateurs" will not fail to respond to the inferential invitation to enter the already over-crowded ranks of professional artistes.

Intimate Studio Gossip

This post brings me a chirping card from Bertram Burleigh, who is now on location in Nice with Maurice Elvey. He says he is having a great time, "but my card tricks do not seem to be any good here. The Prince of Monaco puts one over on me every time." I always thought it a trifle suspicious that B. B. would not work his card tricks if any of the audience was behind him!

As there appears to be some confusion as to the leads in "Cocaine," the latest Master production, I am asked to point out that Hilda Bayley is starring and playing principal lead in that picture, which is being Trade shown in a few days.

According to our despatches from America "The Bigamist" obtained a fine reception from the Trade out there. The press reports were also very favourable. One Trade journal called it "A sumptuous English picture with a vital theme." Another said "It has a satisfactory story, a wonderful lavish production, and a beautiful star to back it up," while a third says "It is a picture pulsating with the succession of light and shadow that we call life," all of which goes to prove that the American has no objection to British films, providing they are pleasing in quality.

On Monday evening Colonel Bromhead, who takes an enthusiastic interest in the social and athletic activities of the staff, gave a dinner to the Gaumont footballers, who have this season brought off a double by winning both the Kine. Weekly Cup and the K.S.A. League. Colonel Bromhead took the chair, and was supported by Reginald C. Bromhead, and the footballers were supported by their wives and sweethearts. Covers were laid for 36. After a very enjoyable dinner, Colonel Bromhead proposed the health of the successful football team, on whose behalf Mr. Phillips, of the Gaumont Shepherd's Bush Works, replied. Reginald Bromhead toasted the Gaumont Sports and Athletic Association, to which F. Strutton responded. C. Tokeley raised his glass to the ladies, and Miss James suitably responded for the fair sex. A. Hart, proposing a vote of thanks to Colonel Bromhead and Reginald Bromhead, was whole-hearted in his assurance of the staff's appreciation of both the moral and financial support given to the club by Messrs. Bromhead. The evening was concluded by a visit to the Prince of Wales Theatre.

It was with profound regret that the profession heard of the sudden death in Paris of H. V. Esmond. His last film performance was in "The Law Divine." "When We Were Twenty-one" was twice filmed, and several other Esmond plays were adapted to the screen in the States. The sympathies of all go to Eva Moore in her bereavement.

I learn that Victor McLaglen has branched out as a fencing master. His classes, which will be open to both sexes, are designed not merely for film purposes but as a sure means of everyday physical fitness.

I was among the Press men that had a few minutes chat with D. W. Griffith on Tuesday evening, and was pleasantly impressed with the gentleman. To my mind there is no coincidence in the fact that D. W. Griffith is both a super-director and a man of vision. His "dream" may be all showmanship talk, but I believe that it is this sense of pre-vision that enables him to anticipate the kinematographic taste of the public. At any rate, he must be an encouragement to that school in the profession who are prepared to Think Big and take risks for the realisation of their ideas.

There is some degree of mystery behind the Griffith visit. The most subtle interviewer cannot gain any real information as to his intentions. There is a greater significance to the British film industry in his visit than is superficially apparent, and of this more will be heard in the near future.

All those who have not yet secured fancy costumes for the Kinema Club Carnival, should make sure of getting them by ordering now. A great deal of the fun depends on coming in fancy dress, which seems so much freer than starched-front shirts and sombre black dress suits. Mr. Thornton, of H. and M. Rayne, 15, Rupert Street, W., has been making special arrangements to cope with the big demand for costumes, and has ordered some new and striking costumes for April 26.

The fickleness of our climate has often been raised as an excuse for the deficiencies of producing films in this country. That being so, it is interesting to know that many of the scenes in the "Bohemian Girl" were taken at Windsor in November and January, often between intervals of thick fog! It is an achievement of which Alliance might well be proud. Harley Knoles, I am told, took five weeks to cast the players. He states that the stars were chosen not because of their names but because they were the most suitable. Each had special tests in front of the camera before he or she agreed to take part in the film. It is claimed for some of the "sets" that they are the most wonderful ever produced, and will make American directors look to their laurels.

There has occurred another of those unpleasant incidents that can only react to the hurt of the profession. We refer to the public exhibition of "A Gamble in Lives" which was adapted, directed, cut and edited by George Ridgwell for B. and C. some months ago and which is now being shown to the public without any mention of the name of the man who had created this film. The information in our possession points to the fact that when this film was sold by B. and C. to Pathé the latter was so eager to give credit to George Ridgwell that it had a special main title made for printing with the copies, and Pathé was amazed this week to find that this had not been done. Although B. and C. was responsible for the printing of the copies we cannot believe that Mr. Godal himself is aware of the serious omission that has been made. George Ridgwell parted company with B. and C. soon after the completion of "A Gamble in Lives," but we are confident that Mr. Godal would be the first to give credit where credit is due for this picture, which is one of the best British productions yet screened.

CLUB SUBS

REFERRING to our "Focus" paragraphs in last week's issue of the STUDIO, Rex Davis makes his debut as the Executive Committee's Official Apologist. He writes:—

In your last issue you write somewhat severely about the Executive Committee. You point out that "it is over three months since the last of the Founder Members were enrolled."

You then call attention to the fact that "a large number of Founder Members still owe their first year's subscription," and your comment on this is "unless the Executive wishes to earn the hearty disapproval of the members it should take drastic action at once. The names of the defaulting members should be posted."

You advise that 7 days be given for payment, and failing payment defaulters be called on to resign.

The Executive Committee is bound by the rules of the Club, and Rule VIII. (b) provides that the subscription for Founder Members shall be payable before January 5th in each year, and (h) "that if a member fail to pay his subscription within a month after it is due he shall be notified, and at the expiration of the 3rd month his name shall be placed on the notice boards of the Club as being in arrears, and thereafter his name may be removed by the Executive Committee from the list of members."

The meaning of (h) is vague. "The expiration of the 3rd month" may mean the 3rd month after the date when the subscription became due. This would give the Committee power to act after April 5, or it may mean the 3rd month after the notice. This would preclude the Committee moving until after May 5.

I understand the rules are in course of revision, and it is hoped that ambiguities may be avoided and the powers of the Committee clearly defined and made, in some respects, more drastic.

With regard to the action or inaction of the Executive Committee, I venture to suggest that your censure is, in any case, premature.

The fact that the STUDIO was appointed by the Executive Committee to be the Official Organ of the Kinema Club is not interpreted by us to mean that we are precluded from criticising the action of the Committee when the occasion arises. To our mind that occasion has arisen, and it was in the best interests of the Club and the profession that we commented on the farcical situation that exists.

The letter that was sent to all the members by the Executive Committee and which made pointed references to the fact that many members had still refrained from paying their subscriptions was scarcely a statesmanlike act. There is, we are informed, over £300 still out in unpaid subscriptions, and we are convinced that this is sufficient to justify the Executive Committee taking the drastic action we recommended last week. No amount of pseudo-legal quibbling over the "ambiguities" of the rules can excuse the Committee for a form of weakness that can only re-act to the hurt of the Club.

The course of action is as obvious as the facts. No reasonable person has any doubt as to the meaning of Rule VIII. (h). The meaning is not vague; it does not mean "the third month after the

HAVE we been a Jazz Band long, sir?
Not more than a week, as it were—
We'd been asked to play at the Club, sir,
At that "Go as you please" dance affair.
So Victor, the Peer-less pianist,
Proceeded to learn all he could
Of the latest dance tunes of the day, sir,
And he "tickled the ivories" good!
Then Malcolm just Tod-dled right in, sir,
With his cute Swanee Whistle, and so—
As he knows all the dance tunes that matter
He can "slide" out the lot at one go!
Then Raymond—Jack Raymond, I mean, sir!—
With a black case appeared on the scene
And gave us some harmony fine, sir!
From the eight strings of his Banjoline.

We had to rehearse when we could, sir;
Two were working—Ah! that was the rub!
And—as there's no room at the Club, sir,
We practised four times at a pub!
I think we were all a bit "windy"
Until we had played two or three,
We all thank the dancers who encored
And cheered us up wonderfully.
In the distance we saw Billie Bristow,
Who seemed to withstand the shock well,
And Harry says she thought us Worth-y
To appear at the Cecil Hotel.
What do I do? Well! 'Twixt you and I, sir,
I may tell you that my job is "thumbs,"
Although it's a lot to pack up, sir.
I wangle the traps and the drums!

SUPER PHILOSOPHY

VI.—Disillusioned

THE other evening I discovered the Super gazing gloomily into the middle distance over his empty tankard. Following the direction of his gaze, I saw half a dozen equally empty glasses on a shelf at the back of the bar, each reflected in the mirror at the back, and re-reflected to infinity by another on the wall opposite. Thinking he must be depressed at the sight of so much emptiness in a hollow, thirsty world, I had his tankard quietly refilled.

His eye left the middle distance and looked long and scarchingly at the beer. "It's one of those days with me when as likely as not there be a fly in it," he said explanatorily.

"Earned three guineas yesterday on a film," he said, suddenly.

"Not so bad, that, for a day's work, surely?" I suggested.

"Money ain't everything," he answered, and added: "the price of all my illusions." I kept a discreet silence, and presently he resumed:

"Yesterday morning I was broke and comparatively 'appy; this morning, what am I? A whited-sepulchre! That blarsted prodoocer—I beg 'is pardon—director, he calls 'imself, and may be 'e's right. Any fool of a ordnery sailor can direct a ship with one 'and on the wheel; it takes brains and 'ard work to prodooce one." The sarcasm apparently pleased him; he smiled grimly, and emptied the tankard. "I'll tell yer," he said, endeavouring to puncture me with a lean forefinger.

"Yesterday morning I was in Zamland's outer office, not because I expected work; but they don't open till 'alf-past eleven, and you must go somewhere. 'Oo should come through but Zamland himself. Naturally, he spots me—it ain't every film artiste 'as a natural dignified bearing like I 'ave—and beckons me into his office.

"Three guineas any good to yer?" he says.

"I knows a place I could put 'em, if they was in need of a 'ome," says I, 'umorous like.

"'E scribbles on a card, and 'ands it to me. 'Good,' 'e says. 'Get right along up to the United Studio, and give it to Mr. Benton. If I'm not much mistaken, you're exactly the type 'e wants. I'll 'phone 'im up, and tell 'im you're coming.

"Off I goes. Why is it you always 'ave to take two separate lines of 'buses, change on to the Metropolitan, and walk two miles from the tram terminus before you can get to any studio? You'd think the firm was ashamed of 'em, the way they 'ide 'em away at the back of brickfields and such like. 'Owever, I found the place at last, and, 'aving got there, they told me the direct way was through Balham and East Ham. Life's like that. I asked to see Mr. Benton, the prodoocer.

"You mean the director," says the chap. "'E's in there—you'll know him by his megaphone."

"Sure enough there was a bloke in the studio with a ventilator tied on to his face with elastic. It wasn't no use to 'im as I could see. If 'e wanted to talk to anyone, 'e 'ad to cant it up over 'is forehead, and then the peak of his cap pushed it down on to 'is nose, and annoyed him.

"Mr. Benton," I says, after watching 'im for a bit.

"Warra-warra!" he answers through the ventilator.

"From Zamland's," I supplements, 'and-ing 'im my card.

"'E looks at it. 'Way-in-ar!' he says again, and turns away. So I did.

"I did it for about an hour; and then he comes back to me minus his ventilator. 'Stand up!' 'e says. 'And let's 'ave a look at you.'"

"What 'e saw seemed to please 'im, 'cos he called another man to admire me, and a delighted grin spreads over 'is coarse features. 'Isn't it wonderful,' 'e says to 'is pal. 'Absolootly right! The exact type! Zamland gets a drink out of me for this!'"

"You will excuse me," I says, 'but understanding I was wanted in a 'urry, I comes straight along up, and I 'aven't got no props with me.'

"My dear man," 'e says, 'you are absolutely right as you are—just a touch of number five and powder, and you can step into the scene. Don't even shave.'

"I couldn't make out what 'e meant by that, 'cos I 'ad shaved Thursday. 'Owever, 'e goes on: 'just read through the scene in the scenario, and we take straight away.'

"'E 'ands me the book, and I reads the page 'e pointed out. Something like this it was:

'Scene. A bar.

'A group of rough men amongst whom is Porter—a long, lean slab of a man, with fishy eyes, down at heel, and drink-sodden—are standing drinking. Enter Lord Charles Dilmot. He orders a drink. Porter lurches up to him, and says, "Yah! A toff! We don't want toffs 'ere!" Dilmot, with flashing eye, turns on him, speaks:

'Sub-Title:

'A man may be a duke and yet an honest man. You coward, to throw my parentage in my face.'

'Porter threatens him. Dilmot, unafraid, draws revolver. Porter terrified. With a supreme gesture Dilmot turns his back, and exits.'

"Well," said the super, "I practised it by meself for about an hour. 'Flashing eye'—I could draw sparks almost. And the 'supreme gesture'—a combination of nobility, grace, contempt, and restrained despair. Lost meself in the part. Well, at last I knocked my own beer over with the 'supreme gesture,' and decided I'd practised enough.

"At last that Benton comes back. We was all waiting for 'im.

"Read it?" 'e says.

"Yes," we answers.

"Then off we go," says 'e."

"There was the set—the bar—the men drinking. 'You all sit over there,' calls Benton. 'Now, Dilmot!' On I walks, leans negligee on the bar. 'Stop!' roars Benton. 'Wodtheyell are you supposed to be doing?'"

"Didn't you say, 'Now, Dilmot,' says I."

"'E looks at me for a moment in blank amazement. 'Gawd!' 'e shouts. 'Gawd! you ain't Dilmot, you ruddy fool! You're Porter!'"

The Super looked away from me into the middle distance again. There was a long silence, then he muttered more to himself than me, I fancy: "And I did it—I did it. 'A long, lean slab of a man with fishy eyes.' Me! Just the type! 'Down at heel and drink-sodden.' I did it! For thirty pieces of silver, and three bob extra. More than Judas got . . . Just the type. Sold me self-respect for that. Thirty pieces of silver.

. . . And Judas never 'ad to pay commision to Zamland's neither. . . . Wot a life!"

I signalled quietly to the barmaid, she nodded. The Super was still staring at the empty glasses as I crept out, but his fingers were feeling for the handle of the tankard.

FILMING MADE TOO EASY

IT seems foolish that in the Topical business the ridiculous exclusive rights principle still prevails and promises to do so for many a long day. Each week we read of huge sums being paid away for exclusive film rights of important events, and in most cases the larger the sum paid the bigger the incentive to the opposition firm to "pirate" the picture.

Exclusive rights have hardly one advantage, although they possess hundreds of disadvantages. In the first case they tend to make the cameraman careless. He is quite certain that the opposition will find it impossible to steal the picture, and when he gets back to town he is surprised to see the opposition's stolen picture showing at the halls. It is always the way—the stolen picture is always shown on the screen first; and, after all, in Topical work it is the man who has the picture showing first that scores.

Then there is another aspect. Topical cameramen suffer as a result of this principle. The huge sums spent on exclusive rights would be better to be kept by the firm, and some of it added on to the salaries of the cameramen. The firm would benefit in the long run.

So long as there are exclusive rights, the British Topical cameraman will never have an opportunity to show his worth. If there were no exclusive rights, it would be the best man who got the best stuff, and it would only be by employing real, go-ahead men that the firms would keep open. The company that obtains the exclusive rights can send anyone down with a camera, and that man will be given a position and will get a picture. Without exclusive rights only the really experienced man could get a picture. In America the exclusive rights have been destroyed, it would be quite easy to destroy them here.

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

THE K.C.S. has formally welcomed the new Producers' Association, and is inviting a representative of that body to attend the Cameramen's dinner.

At the present moment the dinner is occupying the attention of a special committee, comprising Kenneth Gordon, Charlie Heath, and A. Kingston. It has not yet been decided where the dinner will be held, but it is hoped that cameramen wishing to be present will communicate with the secretary, to say how many tickets they require.

The secretary has to guarantee a certain number of people before he can book a room for the affair, and unless the members co-operate with him, by sending in their names for tickets, he will be unable to estimate the number likely to be present.

Quite a number of cameramen have been finding jobs through the medium of the Society. Last week alone three or four members were given work and for some of the big events like the National, Princess Mary's Wedding, and the Boat Race, twenty or thirty men have been required. Members out of work should keep in constant touch with the secretary, who may be able to fix them up.

Representatives of the K.R.S., K.M.A., C.E.A., the new Directors Association, the Trade Press and the Kinema Club, are to be the guests of the Cameramen at the dinner on April 27 or 28.

USES FOR THE CAMERA

THE use of the kine. camera is only just beginning to be recognised.

The slow motion picture has proved helpful to inventors in slowing down motion and by this means they are able to witness on the screen all the little flaws in the mechanism of their work, and to correct them. In the ordinary way these flaws would not be visible to the naked eye, and the inventor might go on experimenting for years without ever finding them out.

The slow motion picture has proved useful to the Government, who used it recently in connection with some experiments it was carrying out.

In the hospitals, the camera has been used to advantage. Photographs of operations and patients suffering from various diseases have been taken and used to advantage in teaching students.

Recently Kenneth Gordon, of Pathé's, had a number of patients from hospital carried round to his studio for photographing. He also photographed the patients in the hospital. The films are more advantageous in teaching students, for they are now able to see enlarged close-ups on the screen, and are able to follow the operation more closely.

These are only a few of the ways in which the camera is being used to-day, but there are hundreds of possibilities in this direction.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

TOPICAL scored two distinct scoops during the past week, which are worthy of mention. The "pirating" of the Grand National was a very clever piece of work, and one which has caused a great deal of amusement among cameramen. Then the filming of the Boat Race was another scoop, for the picture was showing at seven o'clock in the evening of Boat Race night.

W. Bool has been back from India nearly a fortnight now. He has many interesting tales to tell of his adventures out there. I saw some of the film that Woods-Taylor and he took of the Prince of Wales's Tour, and am of the opinion that it is the best stuff yet taken in India. There is none of the usual harshness about it that one connects with photographs taken under India's blazing sun. For all the difference in the quality of the film, it might have been filmed here in England. Some of the shots of the tiger-hunt photographed in the jungle are really excellent. They were shot from the howdah on the back of a restive elephant.

George Woods-Taylor should be home by the time this appears in print. He is assured of a warm welcome when he turns up at the meeting of the K.C.S. The cameramen are welcoming him back in great style, for a dinner of cameramen is being arranged to take place at the end of this month.

The fact that 'Spurs will not play in the Cup Final this year loses for the official film a great deal of the interest evinced in it by many. Still, even then, it should be interesting. Topical has made elaborate arrangements to ensure that it gets the Final exclusive and that there is no "pirating" by rival firms.

Jack Cox is doing quite a lot of running back and forward to the Continent with Elvey's Stoll company. He filmed most of his last picture in the snows of the Swiss mountains, and at present he is in the warmer latitudes of the Riviera, where he is filming at Nice the exteriors of "A Man and His Kingdom."

Some more of Percy Strong's work was shown to the Trade last week, when Stoll presented at the London Pavilion "The Little Brother of God." One of the features of the picture was the photography, which at times was fine. Some of the interiors seemed rather dank, however, which was no doubt due to a dark print.

Bert Ford is photographing a series of comedies for a new company, which has for its star Lily Long, the vaudeville artiste. Ford started work this week and has practically finished the first film. It is interesting to note that this is the first work he has done for any company other than George Clarke for some years.

FINANCE FACTS

by MILES MANDER

Evelyn Brent finishes her interesting article in last week's STUDIO with an observation to this effect: "If only British financiers would give British directors the support they get in America," etc.

Now, although this remark, coming from Miss Brent, sounds attractively naive, she must realise like anyone else who has given the subject a thought, the reason why British producing concerns do not get the financial support that is forthcoming in the States.

Apart from the fact that during the five years that we were otherwise engaged over here, the American industry gained a supremacy which is only now commencing to be challenged, the mere fact that there are 20,000 kinema theatres over there, compared with 4,000 over here, is surely a sufficient explanation.

If we had a fine field of 20,000 theatres of our own to exploit, and could treat the rest of the world as an extra "perk," unenterprising poor "fish" as we sometimes are, I do not think our financiers would then be found wanting. On the other hand, to spend many thousands on a production and rely on an overstocked foreign market for the recovery of outlay and profit is at the present juncture altogether too speculative.

Besides publicity facts like "$50,000 worth of dresses positively torn up in this picture," leaves us here in old England quite unmoved.

FILM TRAINING

by CONNIE TAYLOR

The particular point on which I am curious is raised by an article "Organising the Artistes" in a recent issue, which points out the unsuitability of the theatrical profession as a training ground for film acting. With this I agree, the two arts differing so much in technique that we find few recruits from the stage who are other than hampered by the experience. But what, then, is the proper training ground? for it sticks in my memory that I have seen you publish articles just as positively declaring that schools are utterly useless, and, again, as schools are at present, I agree.

There remains only, so far as I can see, the training to be got in crowd work.

When I think of how crowds are often selected, you will hardly persuade the director to look for fresh talent among them unless you first reform the crowd. The class of person who is crowding out the serious film artiste is not so much the hard-working theatrical "pro" as the lady who offers a wardrobe, costing anything from £150 to £400 a year, in exchange for occasional work at a guinea a day. The theatricals, after all, need the guineas, and do work—these other ladies come in merely to feed their vanity, and it's too much trouble for them to attend to their job. I can think of no more lamentably improbable field in which to seek for new talent than crowds.

Nor need we look further for the reasons which make it impossible for film artistes (of my own sex, at any rate) to combine. We can always be replaced by well-to-do-black-legs so long as a one-guinea actress in a thirty-guinea frock represents the ideal of "handsome production."—CONNIE TAYLOR.

SCREEN VALUES
MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"A Master of Craft."

Ideal—Starring Fred Groves—supported by Pope Stammer, Charles Windermere, Eva Westlake, José Shannon, Ida Fane, Reginald Back, Lilian Douglas, Mercy Hattor, Winifred Dennis, Jerold Robertshaw, Charles Ashton, Harry A. Mymott, Arthur Cleave, Charles Cribb, and John Kelt.—Directed by Thomas Bentley.—Photographed by William Shenton.

THERE must be a divine gift for making a good film comedy of W. W. Jacobs' stories; a gift that is in the laps of the gods; a gift that has evidently not fallen at the feet of Thomas Bentley, who has somewhat failed in getting the true Jacobs' comedy on to the screen. The Jacobs' humour is not clumsy, crude, or heavily apparent, but subtle and delicate.

Fred Groves again proves that he is one of Britain's best screen artistes, and this, despite the fact that he was not given all the opportunities he deserved. He is skilful, intelligent, and delicately artistic in all he does.

Arthur Cleave submits a performance which makes up in quality what it lacks in quantity.

Mercy Hattor, who has not been seen so much as of yore, evidences the same histrionic ability as of old, coupled with a charming screen personality.

Neither the scenario nor photography is of the best quality. The continuity is broken until the story resolves itself down to a series of more or less disconnected incidents.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Fair.
LEAD: Fred Groves excellent.
SUPPORTS: Generally good.
LITERARY: Poor.
PHOTOGRAPHY: Average.
INTERIORS: Realistic.
EXTERIORS: Good.

"Shirley."

Ideal—starring Carlotta Breese and Clive Brook—supported by Elizabeth Irving, Mabel Terry Lewis, Harvey Braban, Joe Nightingale, David Millar, and Dimitri Vetter.—Directed by A. V. Bramble.—Photographed by H. W. Whadden.—Scenario by A. Q. Walton.

THIS would have been an ideal film entertainment were it not for a misfortune in casting. As it is, A. V. Bramble has succeeded in maintaining the Brontë atmosphere and at the same time imparting the necessary dramatic intensity to a Victorian romance.

So far as acting is concerned, Clive Brook is the outstanding personality. As Robert Moore, his performance is perfect, and he succeeds in saving the histrionic value of the film which was in danger of being seriously impaired by the two female leads.

Carlotta Breese is not sufficiently convincing, which may be due to the fact that she has not steeped her personality in that of the character. Be the reason what it may, the fact remains that she lacks the dramatic power necessary to transform a early-Victorian woman into a figure interesting to the modern mind.

Elizabeth Irving has also been faultily cast, and is unable to face the bigger dramatic demands.

The story has lost nothing but gained much in being transferred to the screen. The Brontë analysis of human nature has been retained with the addition of a little modern dramatic power that has improved it.

In no scene does Whadden's photography descend to the average level: it is one of the best parts of the production.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Good.
LEADS: Clive Brook perfect. Females faulty.
SUPPORTS: Satisfactory.
LITERARY: Good original story made into a good film continuity.
PHOTOGRAPHY: Excellent.
INTERIORS: Convincing.
EXTERIORS: Good.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

THE most popular clatter at the club during the past week was the sound of the Kinema Club Kine-copaters (the club's own jazz band), which made its debut on Good Friday at the go-as-you-please dance. During the afternoon these four irrepressibles practised on one of the upper floors—a fact which added to the enjoyment of those having tea in the lounge. And when the dancing commenced the Kine-copaters, in their pierrot costumes (by courtesy of Nathan), dazzled everyone present with the brilliance of their syncopated harmonies. They were applauded to the echo, and during a lull Malcolm Tod made a delightfully humorous speech, punctuated by musical (and unmusical) interruptions from Cyril Percival, the tenor of which was an appeal for contributions to the Entertainment Fund. This Toddishly moving passage “touched” most people present, with the result that the fund benefited by several pounds.

Another result of the debut was the engagement on the spot of the Kine-copaters for next Saturday's dance and the carnival at the Cecil. Those members who do not enjoy a real rollicking, frolicking time should not come near No. 9 next Saturday between the hours of 8.30 p.m. and midnight. Those who do can dance for nothing, but guests have to pay 2s. 6d.

And now for the carnival. There is room for 750 dancers at the Hotel Cecil, and the floor is perfect. The price is lower than similar functions, and includes a substantial four-course supper, in addition to a buffet, which will be in operation throughout the whole course of the dance. Members' tickets are offered at 15s. (one ticket for one member) and non-members, 25s. single, £2 7s. 6d. double.

I am asked to urge those who desire tickets to state their requirements immediately, and to this end a form is printed on this page. Please fill and post with remittance at once.

notice,” it means what every member has long since read it to mean, viz., “the third month after the date when the subscription became due.” And this does not “preclude the Committee moving until after May 5.”

The whole weight of opinion of the Club members is with us in this matter. And the effects of mishandling this situation could easily become very expensive. So much so, in fact, that we would go so far as to say that there is something worse than a misreading of the letter of the rule and that is a misreading of the spirit of the rule—and something worse than a breach in the rules, and that is a breach in the Club.

Before sending that ill-fated circular letter to all the members the Committee ought to have called a General Meeting of the members and explained the situation fully. The Committee has overlooked the fact that it has no right to saddle the collective members of the Club with any further financial responsibilities unless the consent of the members has been obtained first.

With all deference to Rex Davis (and no one appreciates his labours for the good of the Club more than we) we continue to maintain that the Executive Committee ought to conform to its own rules: post the names of the defaulting Founder Members (some of whom are well-known directors and stars who can easily afford the small subscription) and then if they do not shoulder their responsibilities call on them to resign.

That our censure was not at all premature is proved by the action of the Committee in endeavouring to get the paid-up members to relieve the unpaid members by subscribing to a loan.

A Propaganda Agent.

DURING the past week the general public has progressed another stage in its cinematographic education as a result of the momentous visit of D. W. Griffith, who is not merely an American director but a film internationalist. His visit has been responsible for two new revelations for the edification of the public. In the first place he has not merely come in the guise of an evangelist, but his evangel has caused the public and the Press to recognise that the Screen has a function far higher than that of tickling the risible faculty by slapstick crudities or of fluttering the breasts of susceptible flappers and confirmed old maids by the exploits of debonair heroes. Mr. Griffith has demonstrated that film art is something larger and more noble than all this; that its appeal and its force can be the most comprehensive thing in the world; that it can contribute to the common weal of the world all that is best and most worthy. Unknowingly, then, D.W.G. has accomplished the best piece of propaganda for the cinematograph that has yet been attempted. The Public and the Press have been forced to see the worth-while character of films and the supreme influence that they can have on the welfare of the world.

Men Behind the Megaphone.

BUT that is not all. There is another result of the Griffith visit, and one which affects the profession more intimately. This visit has caused the public to recognise the cleavage between itself and the profession; and in the light of this recognition it has perceived for the first time the all-importance of the director to the films for which he is responsible. There has—in the Trade even—been a tardiness correctly to appraise the worth of the brain behind the production. The public shrieked itself almost insane over Pickford, Fairbanks and Chaplin when they visited London, but the visit of Griffith has caused it to get a glimmer of the relative values of star and director. Griffith is of far more value to the film industry than Pickford, Fairbanks and Chaplin put together. Any skilful director is of more value than an artiste. This fact may be bitter to swallow: truth often is unpalatable.

* * *

Wrong Sense of Values.

TO the man in the street, and often to the man in the Trade, unfortunately, the name of the director is unknown. If it is known, it means nothing; it is merely two words flashed on the screen for as many seconds, jumbled up with the names of scenarist, cameraman, art-director and numerous other "directors." And yet the director is the centre and the circumference of the production, the pivot around which everything else revolves. Into his hands is placed the destiny of the film. The success of the artiste is given over to his safe keeping; the financial results and the public's entertainment depend upon him. But because of the

¶ It never rains trouble but it pours—which is not the case with success which seldom comes in lumps. Generally speaking success comes by a gradual and almost imperceptible process.

And there is a reason for this. It is due to the law that governs such matters: the law that decrees that faithfulness to duty is inevitably rewarded. And while a little thing may be a little thing faithfulness in a little thing is a great thing.

¶ So that success can only follow the law that governs success—faithfulness.

wrong sense of values that the public has obtained (which, in its turn, is due to the misapplied energies of publicity experts), the star gets all the limelight and the plaudits, and the director does not even get a thought.

* * *

The Fraternity of Directors.

THIS state of affairs the visit of Griffith lit up with the same vividness that a sudden flash of lightning reveals the gloom of the storm-bound moor; and the Press of the land were generous in their tributes to this representative of the fraternity of directors. We sincerely trust that the Trade will not be slow in following the lay Press in this matter and afford to the directorial class the recognition that is its right. Last week we recorded an instance that is relative to these comments: the name of George Ridgwell had been omitted from the main title of his B. & C. production "A Gamble in Lives," which Pathe is handling. We desire to place on record the fact that so soon as we communicated with Pathe on this matter, that firm instantly had new main titles prepared and circulated round to every kinema that had a copy of the film, so that by the evening performance the public was able to appreciate the work of the man whose genius and creative ability were responsible for that excellent British production.

Vicious Critics.

FORTUNATELY for the film industry, it is now facing fierce criticism; and more fortunately still, it is coming out of the ordeal with great credit to itself. We say "fortunately" because the existence of the criticism pre-supposes the success of the industry, for criticism only awaits on successful achievements—failures are beneath criticism. Criticism—and all forms of opposition, for that matter—is a constructive force: hence the benefit the film industry must gain as a result of the recent and present criticism. For this journal we claim the right to criticise, condemn or approve whenever we honestly believe either of these courses is right and merited. And in the past this right has been exercised. This we state in order to justify our equal right to reprove certain newspapers and certain individuals for the notoriously unjust criticism in which they are at present indulging. What these vicious and vindictive critics are blissfully overlooking when they indulge in comparisons between the screen and the stage is the fact that the former only recently attained its majority. We do not attempt, nor do we wish, to excuse the shortcomings of the film; we merely explain them when we point to the discrepancy in the ages of the two arts. It has taken five centuries for the stage to attain its present position, and in Shakespeare's time actors were classed with "outcasts and scoundrels." In a twentieth of the time it has taken the stage to reach its present standard it has taken the kinema to grow from a magic-lantern show in a whitewashed cowshed to the wonderful art it is to-day.

FINDING FILM FACES

by SIDNEY JAY.

I WAS standing outside the London Hippodrome very much down and out. Not a sou in my pocket, and an aching void in my inside. I had a horrible touch of the hump.

Suddenly my morbid thoughts were disturbed by a brisk voice, and a well-dressed man confronted me and said:—

"You've got a convict's face and appearance!"

To cut a long story short, that blunt fellow happened to be a kinema director. He was in the cart! He couldn't find a convict face for his film to save his life. He had been scouring London. And yet there were hundreds of poor, half-starved chaps who were going on their hands and knees for a job.

"Convict Ninety-Nine" was the play for which he was trying to find actors, and you may be sure that I jumped at the job. I discovered during the shooting of that film that managers were very often unable to get certain actors quickly to take suitable parts.

So at the end of that day I told the manager I intended to wait for his urgent telephone messages at my "office," and if he wanted a hundred men or women, boys or girls, for any part, I could provide them in less than one hour.

My luck was in! He agreed eagerly. But you can imagine how I was grinning up my sleeve. Office, indeed! The telephone number I gave him to ring me was that of a small, dingy little coffee-house in the backwoods of Soho.

I used to hang round that telephone for calls all day, and sometimes well into the evening, and was asked to find film actors of various types at the shortest possible notice.

After a few weeks I moved my "office" to a top back room in Oxford Street—it was a better address!

Some of the demands I received were very funny. I used to get telegrams and letters and 'phone messages—and do now—for, say, three kitchen sluts, one pretty, innocent, fair-haired heroine, one fast woman, a six-foot, strong, muscular hero, a bulldog, two Persian cats, and a one-eyed crossing-sweeper!

But a picture agent's work is spoiled by dreadful and painful tragedies. Although I am now used to seeing so many starving, unemployed men and women daily, my heart really bleeds for them at times. I sincerely hope that this will be a grave warning, and a timely one, to film-struck girls—and men, too, for they are just as much to blame. I am not in the least exaggerating when I assure you that people have ruined their lives, caused themselves endless misery and illness, and even caused their own deaths, through rashly becoming film-struck.—Pearson's Weekly.

ACCORDING to the Berlin correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, a Berlin chemist, Gustáv Schaaf, has devised a process enabling any celluloid film to be made absolutely non-flammable. When heated strongly it will crimp in and melt without developing any noxious gases. The well-known qualities of the celluloid film, its flexibility and transparency, will not in any way be impaired by the treatment.

There is only one mechanical difference between non-flammable and ordinary, ignitable films—viz., the fact that the former, without having lost anything of its flexibility, has gained considerably greater toughness and mechanical resistance. The non-flammability, once acquired, remains a permanent characteristic of the film.

Another scheme devised by M. Werthen is also being made known. This inventor adopts aluminium for his films, rolled into

NON-FLAM FILMS

A New German Invention

thin and flexible bands with a uniform fine-grained surface. Inasmuch as both sides of such a film can be used for recording, it is even lighter than a celluloid film, a length of, say, 1,000 metres (the equivalent of 2,000 metres of celluloid film) weighing only 15 kgs.

Much difficulty was encountered in uniting the photographic layer with the aluminium. This was done by inserting between the metal surface and the layer a thin skin of water-glass, thus producing so intimate a union that even bending or crumpling the film will not injure the photographic emulsion.

It is claimed that the aluminium film possesses all the good points of the celluloid film, from a technical point of view. Moreover, it, of course, is not only non-flammable but absolutely incombustible, allowing any ordinary projector to be used, and enabling any picture to be stopped for any length of time in its focus without any appreciable increase in temperature. Inasmuch as the aluminium film is not transparent the aluminium surface serves as a mirror, from which the light is reflected in accordance with its variable shades of luminous intensity.

Other advantages of the aluminium film are its greater cheapness, a practically unlimited life, and, in the case of countries such as Germany, the fact that the raw materials are found at home.

NOTHING DOING!

by RUPERT CREW,

THERE is something about the adjective "original" with reference to screen stories that scenario-editors of film producing companies seem to dislike. If you write to any company and inquire whether it is interested in original screen stories, ten chances to one you won't even get a reply. I know, because I have written a round dozen letters myself this year. I don't offer a scenario, either; I have just suggested sending a good detailed synopsis of my story. But even that inquiry has resulted in few fishers.

During the past few weeks I have been particularly anxious to "get out" a recently completed story. I spent much time in writing letters in my endeavour to find a company in the least interested in what I had to offer. At last, when thoroughly fed-up with wasting time and postage stamps, I did get a reply, and was rather startled by the letter. The scenario-editor, a man with a flourishing signature, and evidently warm heart, wrote to the effect that he would be "very glad" to consider my manuscript!

Needless to say, I posted off the script at the earliest opportunity, and mopped the sweat of relief from my brow. I don't care how long he keeps it!

Now let us pause and consider for a moment the reason why film-producing companies appear so cold in their reception of the original story. Is it a fact that directors still pin their faith to published novels and produce plays by authors and dramatists with big names? Do they still regard the strength of an author's name to be more important than the quality of his story? However, speaking broadly, original stories don't "catch on" anywhere. Why?

For more than one reason: In the first place, few writers have any notion how a story should be presented in order that it may appeal to the scenario-editor. If he does not send him reams of an "alleged scenario," he sends a bare plot in a very few lines. So far as I can see, the best way to submit an original story is to send in a very carefully arranged detailed synopsis—almost a synopsis of the scenario. It is most essential to tabulate all the principal interiors and exteriors; to describe any particular effects, in order that expenditure may be judged. Neither should mention of the main cast be forgotten.

I am told that the majority of stories written specially for the screen come from the pens of amateur writers, people "who want to write for the movies," people who say they are "down and out," actors, sometimes directors. Sandwiched in come stories written by those who have gained some knowledge of the film studio and its workings, those who can write a scenario of a kind, but are not—and never can be—literary craftsmen.

Scenario-writing is one thing. Story writing is quite another. It is my contention that a scenarist, pure and simple, is unable to write an original scenario, because he or she is not an author.

Look at our present-day scenarists. What were they before they took up scenario-writing as their profession? Very seldom fiction writers. Most of them were actors, first for the legitimate stage, then for the screen. It is ridiculous to suppose that they are capable of writing stories of real literary merit. There is a gulf of difference between the arts of scenario-writing and story writing. To my mind, the only way an original story can be properly written is for an author either to study film production and scenario-writing within the studios, or for him to work in direct collaboration with a really competent scenarist. I do not see how it is possible for anyone to write a story of real literary merit unless it is done by a fiction-writer who has made a name for himself.

Until the untrained amateur is "choked off," and stories are written by experienced writers of stories, scenario-editors will remain distant in manner to those like myself—a fiction-writer—who has met with some little success, and is anxious to write for the screen.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Owing to the special arrangements we have made to give a full page to the Dance which took place after we had really gone to press, it was found necessary to hold over the Cameraman's Section and Club Clatter. But our next issue will be a Special Cameramen's Number chock-full of matters of interest to cameramen, as well as a full report of the K.C.S. annual dinner.

And as to the Club! An institution that can flourish like our Club is in these dreary days is almost performing a miracle. And our Club is doing better each week. Fred Groves, the chairman of the house committee, tells me that the bar receipts and attendance book show a most pronounced upward tendency. Much of the organising energy has been directed to the preliminaries of the Carnival which, writing on Wednesday afternoon, gives promise of being a huge success. Meanwhile the social life at the Club has been in full swing with dances, whist drives, billiard matches and snooker tournaments. And on Thursday the swimming section held a pleasant contest at the Kensington Baths.

Last Tuesday I made a special visit to the Shaftesbury Pavilion to see Henry Victor's work in "Diana of the Crossways," but was disappointed to find that since the original announcement Ideal had altered the Trade show. There was quite a crowd of disappointed folks, but for the benefit of those who particularly desire to see Henry Victor in this film I am authorised by Ideal to announce that "Diana of the Crossways" will be Trade shown at the Shaftesbury Pavilion this Monday, May 1, when no doubt Fay Compton will be Queen of the May.

Owing to a sudden alteration in his plans, D. W. Griffith was prevented from attending the Carnival. In fact he sailed for America on the day it was held. It would be very interesting to know the significance of this abrupt return, especially in view of the fact that he definitely asserted, on the eve of his departure, that he would return in a few months' time. Is it to make a picture in this country?

As we go to press we receive a cable from our American representative with the information that Marshal

MACDONALD'S DISCLAIMER.

In your issue of last week you mention my name as being connected with the "Amateur Film Production Agency." I herewith desire, most emphatically, to state that in no way am I connected with the school mentioned above, and I also desire to state the true facts of the case, viz.:-

(1) I was approached by a well-known dramatic agency, the reputation of which is above reproach, with the proposition of directing a film for the Amateur Film Production Academy, Ltd.

After an interview with the business director of this company, he proposed my writing a story suitable for amateurs, with the prospect of directing same. I accepted, with the distinct understanding that I was engaged solely on these terms and in no way should I be connected with the teaching department of the said academy.

(2) In accepting this position, I did so with the idea of the business man of pounds, shillings and pence, which you will readily realise as most necessary in the production of "living" as well as films.

(3) No one has written more "drastic" articles against schools of motion picture acting than I, both in England and America. No one appreciates more than I the most important and necessary plea of the real artiste of the film world, as I have been fortunate in having many working under my direction in the past years, but I might add that the real artistes in moving pictures are few and far between, and thus might arise the question of the difference between an artiste, so-called, and an amateur, and in my experience I have met the former, whom I consider with far less talent than the latter.

(4) As far as I know of this newly-formed academy, its object is more as an amateur cinema society, run on principles similar to an amateur dramatic society, for many of the latter I have produced stage plays.

(5) I am not a business director of this company, and neither have I invested a penny in same. My position is merely to write a story suitable to their requirements, and if suitable, to direct same—and nothing else.—NORMAN MACDONALD.

Neilan, the famous American director, has sailed for this country. As he is accompanied by his cameraman and others of his staff it would not be unduly surprising if his intention is to direct a picture here. Maurice Tourneur is due in this country next month to direct Hall Caine's "Christian" for Goldwyn.

Another very welcome visitor is Victor Seastrom, the eminent Swedish director of "Thy Soul Shall Bear Witness" fame. He specially arranged his arrival so that he could be present at the Carnival, and he expressed great pleasure at the scene at the Cecil. I learn that he has booked Matheson Lang for two productions, one of which will probably be made in this country. And as Lang is to play Dick Turpin in Stoll's "Ride to York," it would appear that the stage-and-screen star is going to have a busy time.

TRADE SHOW GUIDE

MEMBERS of the profession will do well to note that Ideal Films has altered the date of its Trade show of the Denison Clift production.

"DIANA OF THE CROSSWAYS," to Monday, May 1, at the Shaftesbury Pavilion, at 11.30 a.m.

"TANGLED HEARTS," which was adapted from C. H. Bullivant's novel, and was one of the original Alliance Productions. Gertrude McCoy plays lead and is supported by Henderson Bland, G. H. Mulcaster, Peter Upcher, and Maresco Marisini.

TRADE SHOW: Wednesday, May 3, at the Shaftesbury Pavilion, Shaftesbury Avenue, at 11 a.m.

I made it my business to get from H. B. Parkinson, of Masters, the exact position of the two principals in "Cocaine," and he explains that Hilda Bayley is playing the leading part and Flora Le Breton plays a star part as the heroine of the story. I give this information in order to give Flora Le Breton credit for the important and prominent part that she plays in this film.

JUST CUTTINGS

Items of Interest extracted from the film journals of the world.

If you wish to learn whether or not the public observes the writer's name upon a picture play, foist upon it a poorly done piece of work. The ensuing "roar" will end for ever any doubts you may have as to the importance of the author.

CONFLICT.

The public dearly loves a fight, and as long as there are two red-blooded men alive, I think a good fight will hold its appeal, in life and in drama.

The "struggle everlasting" will continue as long as life lasts. There are very few men who have success handed to them on a silver platter; the majority of us must struggle from the bottom of the ladder up. True, sometimes as we begin to get away from the bottom rungs the struggle is easier; but let us relax for a moment, and we are confronted with somebody trying to pass us on the ladder to Success, and again we must struggle to regain our position. Life without struggle would be drab and dreary. The public will always love a fight, be it mental or be it physical; but let there be the element of conflict, and it will be true to life.—Photodramatist (U.S.A.).

THE ART OF FILMS

Nothing suffers so much from a disagreement by all kinds of people as to their æsthetic function as to do motion pictures. Some people are offended by them, some people are afraid of them, some people are disgusted by them, others are annoyed by them, and an overwhelming majority are tremendously interested in them. If an interplanetary visitor should come to earth and should scrutinise the various phenomena of the time, he would undoubtedly declare in his simplicity that the effect of motion pictures upon human beings was one of the most astounding of all the things he found here. To talk, therefore, of a greater art in a motion picture is not to discuss the capacities of the motion picture camera, which are limitless, but to think only of the possibilities of an increasing desire for more subtle entertainment on the part of this thirty million. The technique of any art is merely an outline in mechanical form of the intelligence of that art's audience. Expression exists only to convey ideas, feelings, attitudes or emotions from one mind to another mind, and the technique of expression is usually the best discoverable way to convey these things. The final process in expression depends always upon the comprehension of the audience, its ability to understand what is expressed.—The Goldwynner.

"But my play is different," insisted the young author. "I am sure you will like it. The heroine, a beautiful young society girl, falls in love with a handsome young burglar, and —"

"Wants to marry him to reform him, but her stern old father objects," interrupts the director.

"Not at all, not at all," replied the author. "The old gentleman, who is a profiteer, is delighted with the match, takes his son-in-law into partnership, and everyone, except the firm's customers, live happy for ever after."—Picture Show (Australia).

THE PUBLIC WANTS

What does the public want?—that oft-repeated cry,
The writer of the day says his creation
Is what the public wants, in pictured plot and style,
They'll throng to see my tale of love and passion.

I feel the public pulse—the famed director cries,
A girl's pure heart—a lover's adoration;
The pulse is felt—the nightly throng scan lithographs, then pass along.
He felt the public pulse and then, he lost it.

What does the public want?—we'll ask the public that.
Replies are many, filled with variation;
We want—the public wants a play, of passion grand, of country jay,
The public wants—not what it wants—and wants it.

QUALITY SUFFERS

Wilfred G. Eyre, a clerk in the American Consulate in London, has forwarded to the U.S. Department of Commerce at Washington a confidential report of film conditions in England. Mr. Eyre states that films of inferior grade are being shown in England to-day. He blames the drop in quality to the block-booking system. Extracts from his report follow:—

"During the past few weeks there have been many reports in the newspapers and elsewhere in regard to the alleged falling off in the attendance of kinema theatres in the United Kingdom, which is attributed to the inferior class of films which is now being shown before the public. As regards London, it is certainly true that even at the best kinema theatres a very inferior class of film is being exhibited in comparison to a year ago. In the United Kingdom there are 4,000 kinema theatres as opposed to the 20,000 in the United States. As practically the entire American film output is booked for exhibition in the United Kingdom, it is inevitable that such a system must be adopted. In addition, there are on the market a large number of British films (produced by British companies, photographed in England and featuring English actors), as well as films produced on the Continent. Moreover, the British films which have been shown to date are inferior to the good American productions. And the patriotism which prompts the exhibitors to show British films is not responded to by the public, which is willing to pay provided it get its movies' worth in amusement.—Wids Daily (U.S.A.).

PEARSON REVIEWED

He does not harangue his actors, or issue short, curt, puzzling directions. He simply stands up, tells them what his clear vision and imagination has conceived, why it has conceived it, and leaves the rest to his cast. They thrill to his master touch, for he is a genius at handling character, at inspiring with his own limpid vision those who act for him. By this I mean everybody, not only the "stars," but the veriest super who only appears for a short breathing space. No matter whether it is Cockney types, with all their bewildering and chameleon-like subtlety, or simple English country folk, there they are, just as true and natural as in real life. He has the practical bias of the typical Englishman, combined with a clear pellucid imagination which makes of trivial details only the crystals to reflect the true life behind.

A George Pearson production is an event in the life both of the Movie Picture Industry and of the kinema-going public, for it is a step forward towards the highest in art and life.—Stoll Herald.

"Work? Perhaps two-thirds of them."

"AFTER THE BALL WAS OVER"

SIX hours ago I was getting into hat and coat at the Cecil; the Carnival being nothing but a memory. It cannot fail to be the source of most pleasant recollections, for it was rightly voted one of the jolliest functions ever held. To call it a success is to fail to describe it. Its good effects can never be adequately estimated.

It not only contributed a goodly sum to the Club funds. It was not only responsible for gathering 800 dancers, or of providing a jolly evening. These are merely the tangible results and somewhat easy of computing. But no one can determine the extent of its beneficial influence in bringing into personal contact the public, the profession and the trade, or of the wonderful piece of propaganda it performed for the whole British film industry.

When I first suggested this Carnival to the Entertainments Committee, I certainly never imagined it would be the huge success it was. This wonderful achievement is due to the Committee in general, and Rex Davis, its chairman, and Billie Bristow, the hon. organiser, in particular. The amount of strenuous toil involved in organising this function can be appreciated by none better than myself, having vivid recollections of the work preliminary to the opening of the Club. The greatest praise is due to Billie Bristow, Rex Davis, and their band of loyal workers for this great success.

But it was worth working for. I viewed the revellers from the balcony, and the scene ought to be photographed by the natural-colour process as a spectacle of colour and animation that would be hard to rival.

With so many leading people of the profession there, it would be difficult to give a complete list. E. G. Turner, of Waltham, and Arthur Clavering, of F.B.O., represented the Renters. Heads of producing concerns were there, and leading directors like Henry Edwards, Denison Clift, Frank Crane, Bertram Phillips, Lisle Lucoque, Geoffrey Malins, and, of course, George Ridgwell. Fay Compton, Gladys Cooper and Hilda Bayley represented the Stage, while a whole host of film stars, including Florence Turner, Ivy Close, Milton Rosmer, Flora Le Breton, Henry Victor, Josephine Earle, Queenie Thomas, Victor McLaglen and a great many more whose names I cannot now recall helped swell the number.

The judges of the costumes were Florence Turner, Edgar Wallace (the novelist), the editors of Pictures and the Dancing Times, and myself. The task was formidable. With such an array of beautiful and original costumes, it was exceedingly difficult to make the awards according to the classes for which each prize was specifically given. The awards were:

Marjorie Hume and Francis Innys (Associated First National prizes).

Babs Bell (Walter West prize).

Victor McLaglen and Hugh E. Wright (Guy Newall and Ivy Duke prizes).

Miss Turner (Ciro's Pearls prize).

Lallie Forsyth (Condor Hats prize).

Flora Le Breton ("Glorious Adventure" prize).

The prize for the best fancy costume went to W. Newman (Ass. First National); the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO prize for the most original costume was awarded to Miss Eaton as the Spirit of Peace. The two prizes presented by W. and F. Films for the balloon contest went to Miss Halliburton and Mr. Faber.

Nor must I omit to compliment the Club's own jazz band—the "Kine Klub Kine-copaters"—who delighted everybody by their syncopated harmonies during a period of the dancing.

And it is a distinct pleasure to record the fact that throughout the whole proceeding the level of conduct and propriety reached a high plane. In face of the hectic functions of the film folks at Hollywood, this fact comes as a vindication of the standard of film professional life in this country. There was no regrettable incident, and the whole proceedings passed without a hitch or anything that could mar the pleasantness of the function.—E. G. A.

ONE-STEPS

George Ridgwell was sporty enough after the ball to drive stranded revellers home in his car.

A number of members are anxious to know what Rex Davis told the old lady who asked him what the Carnival was in aid of.

Gibb McLaughlin has a penchant for Satanic parts. He was in his element on Wednesday night, having grown a pair of horns on his head specially for the occasion!

Kenneth Gordon, arrayed as a pierrot, who successfully "turned on" the Carnival, should have some good shots of the dancing and various incidents for the Pathé Gazette.

Bertram Burleigh, who had just returned from Nice in time for the Carnival, was heard to exclaim that he would not have missed it for worlds.

Doris Eaton was undoubtedly one of the best dressed ladies present; she attended the Carnival with a party of artistes appearing in "Lark's Gate."

Billie Bristow (Hon. Organiser)

J. Stuart Blackton joined in the merry-making along with his wife and daughter, the latter in the costume she wore in "The Glorious Adventure."

Florence Turner, who has been staying at the Cecil for months past, moved out a few days before the Carnival. I met her waiting in the rain for a taxi just after the Carnival had finished, regretting the fact that she had changed her hotel.

There were some energetic novelty sellers going around. One of them was Mollie Adair, who seemed to be doing a roaring trade with the famous "Slymphs" from the Continent.

Elisabeth Brandt looked pretty in her costume representing Swedish films; if there had been a prize offered for a costume of this kind, she would have undoubtedly been awarded it.

Josephine Earle who is very seldom seen in kinema circles nowadays, made a welcome reappearance on Wednesday night.

Alma Taylor was so well disguised that few people knew she was present.

Tony Fraser was kept busy with a new game of chance, which he was exploiting for the benefit of the Club. The game was worked by poking holes in a card.

Max Roma turned up in gorgeous Indian raiment, a vivid contrast to Sid Jay and John Payne, who wore just plain evening dress.

Milton Rosmer, in eighteenth century costume, chasing down the Strand after a taxi at 3.30 in the morning, was a sight one does not often witness.

Warwick Warde's recent visit to Egypt had evidently influenced him in the choice of costume for the Carnival. Arrayed in flowing Eastern robes, he cut a romantic figure.

The exhibition tango by E. Albert and partner was much appreciated.

Kenelm Foss made a very welcome appearance as a seaman.

Ward McAllister was a striking and novel figure as "The Kinema Kid." He appeared in a full evening dress composed entirely of copies of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO and Kinematograph Weekly.

Mercy Hatton looked charming in her old-time costume, which was reminiscent of some of Romney's pictures.

When Victor MacLaglen and Hugh E. Wright appeared in their rough-and-tough attire as tramps in "A Sailor Tramp," the commissionaire not only refused them admittance, but sent for a policeman to eject them from the Cecil. It took nearly half an hour for them to gain admittance.

Earlier in the evening they were walking through Covent Garden, and two coster girls, hailing them as "Mate," offered them some of their "fried fish and chips." They helped themselves!

During the evening Harry Worth sold a number of autographed programs, which realised a good amount for the Club.

THE POSITION OF THE SCREEN AUTHOR

Christabel Lowndes — Yates replies to Sydney Morgan

SYDNEY MORGAN, in his brilliant little series of articles on Screen Authorship in the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO, regrets that "there has been no improvement in the standard of authorship, the most important item" in the film. He goes on to tell us that "directors, renters, exhibitors, are all at their wits' end," and it seems that the trouble is, they all want stories—good stories, real stories of human life, stories that shall grip and appeal—and that they can't get them. So it seems that they have to adapt books instead and rely on the fame of the novels, or the celebrity of the author, or the statistics of the circulation, rather than on the actual merits of the story.

The Trade could get all the stories it wants, by men of outstanding force in the world of letters, if it was prepared to meet the author halfway. But it is not so prepared. Not very long ago I was asked to meet certain authors and members of the Press, and speak to them on the subject of the actual outlook for writers—not amateurs, but professional writers of standing who wished to take up seriously the writing of original plays for the Screen.

I told them that it was quite true that there was a real need of such writers at present, if they could produce big human stories written with expert knowledge of film requirements, but I told them that in England at present there was not a living in it, by which I do not mean that there was not perhaps three or four hundred a year, but that there is not a reasonable living in it for a man of standing, with a wife and family to keep.

How many scenarists are there, writing for the English market, who out of scenario work alone average an income every year that runs into four figures? Sydney Morgan gives his figures, and they seem to be based on fact, that £100 is the usual sum for an adaptation, and £250 for an original play, and that such plays take six months to write.

Now suppose our scenarist is a lucky man, and a hard worker, and one whom directors delight to honour, he may in the course of one year do one adaptation and one original play and sell them both. He then makes the princely sum of £350 a year, and out of what the income-tax-man leaves him he can do his best to struggle along and live. And this, mind you, is not for the struggler, who often cannot sell his work at all, but for the known man of ability. Ye gods! What man would struggle hard to attain such success?

Now supposing an author sells his work in another market, and again we must consider the known man of ability who has succeeded, and puts money into the pocket of the firm who buys his work—in journalism, in novel-writing and short fiction, he is more or less certain of his market, and he can attain a four-figure income and fame.

Authors are not blind to the value of publicity, but how often is the name of an author advertised in the ordinary paragraphs that appear in the Press as well as on the Screen? Hardly ever. The name of the Director is given, the name of the firm, the names of the stars, even the carmeraman, but the name of the author comparatively seldom. Why? When it appears on the screen it is flashed on as one of a maze of names, and flashed off again very quickly. To the writer it is very much as though a book appeared heralded as the Startling Novel published by So-and-So, bound by Such-and-Such, printed by Mr. Someone Else, and sold by the well-known bookseller Mr. Blank.

Yet it is on the author and his stories that the whole future of the British industry depends. If the directors and other heads of the film industry would meet and discuss what they can do to remedy this state of affairs, and send the result of their findings to such a body as the Society of Authors, or the Committee of the Authors' Club, or any other body of English professional writers, they will find that there will be no lack of stories of fine quality written direct for the screen, and they will find too that in the generous treatment of authors lies both fortune and the firm foundation of the Film Industry.

SCENARIO AND SCENARIST

by KINCHEN WOOD

WHAT is a Scenario—and what is a Scenarist? Surely there must be some confusion on this matter, be it important or no.

To the picturegoer the "Scenario" undoubtedly means the "Story," the "Scenarist," therefore, to him must mean the man who wrote the "Scenario" or "Story," i.e., the author. It is not generally known outside the studio that "Scenario" is really the technical term for "Continuity of Action" and that the scenarist is consequently the one who writes the "Continuity" and not the "Story."

Would it not be more explicit therefore if instead of stating on the Screen—"Scenario by—" it stated—"Scenarised by—"?

I would like to add here an appreciation of Sydney Morgan's splendid articles in this paper on "Screen Authorship." Screen Writers and scenarists alike cannot be too grateful to him for the manner in which he champions their very deserving cause. When screen authors are paid a fair sum for original stories and scenarists allowed reasonable time and remuneration for the preparation of their adaptations and continuities—a very marked improvement in British films will be the inevitable result.

No one knows you unless you tell folks about yourself. And in this profession personal publicity is the breath of life.
Show us any leading star and we will show you a keen advertiser.
Tell the profession all about yourself by advertising in the 'Studio.'

SUPER PHILOSOPHY

VII.—The Irony of Tears

THE last time I met the Super, to my surprise, I found him in conversation with a lady. She was of medium size, with grey hair, and dark eyes; but the firmness of her mouth, and the tone of the few words I caught as I entered the bar, seemed to argue that relations were a trifle strained between them.

"Mind you, it's the last, Jim, absolutely the last," I heard her say.

The Super murmured something unintelligible; I thought I saw something pass between them; and the lady, with a scornful—"Well I suppose I shall see you when you want some more"—sailed through the swing door, with a backward glance of scorn, which seemed to include all the habitués.

The Super beckoned me over to his corner. "Know 'oo that was?" he asked, the usual nacherally the mothers weeps, don't they? Well—she's them."

"I begin to see," I said.

"Ah! you been eating fish and got your grey matter livened up at last," said he, rudely. "Mind you,"—he went on—"T'aint so easy as it sounds. Crying on the stage is one thing, any actress as is an actress can do it; but on the films—well, to be able to screw real tears out of your face at a moment's notice, with a man turning the 'andle of the camera within two feet of you, and no encouragement but a cheap gramophone playing 'Ours is a nice 'ouse our's is,' ain't art—it's—genius!"

"Some people use onions—there's something about a onion wot'll melt most people—but the trouble with onions is you melt all over, in a manner of speaking. You cry all right, but you cry with your whole face, mouth, nose, and all. Onions, to my mind, is too comprehensive. But Kate Tolyer she don't use no artificial aids to perspiration, as the saying is. 'Tears?' she says. 'Right-o! Give me a couple o' minutes ter think of 'im, an' for 'eavens sake take before I've washed all my make-up orf.' That's Kate Tolyer. And in a couple of minutes the tears—great big blobby ones, not just a trickle, mind you—will be pouring down 'er cheeks.

"Who does she mean by 'him'?" I asked.

"'Arry 'Obbs, 'er late 'usband," explained the Super. "And that's a queer story too, in a way. 'E was a comic on the stage, and a misery orf. But in spite of 'im 'aving no luck, she was fond of 'im. I reckon. Women are funny that way. Well; 'e dies about five years ago—two pewmonias, the doctor called it—and in order ter get a bit o' black for the funeral, she takes on a crowd job for the Simplex people—the day after 'e'd 'opped it. Jus' a crowd of fishing folk, waiting ter see the corpses brought ashore from a wreck, it was. One of the corpses was the young 'ero, and the woman wot played the mother couldn't screw up enough sorrow to wet a thrupenny bit. Natcherally, the director was a bit wild with her. All of a sudden 'e spots Kate in the crowd. Wot with the corpses in the piece and old 'Arry's corpse at home, she'd broke down completely. 'That's the woman for me,' 'e says. 'Ere, wotever yer name is—can you show this muddle 'caded bunch of incompetence wot a real mother feels like? Kate sobs out that she'll try—and from that moment she never looked back."

"But surely her grief for her late husband must have abated by this time," I suggested. "How does she manage now?"

"Ah! after about three years, she married again," said the Super.

"Don't tell me her second husband died, in order to provide her with a suitable emotion for her speciality!" I exclaimed.

"No!—'e lived!" said the Super, grimly.

"A pretty rotten life for her," I commented.

"And wot about 'im?" said the Super, quickly. "Wot about 'im? 'E's fond of 'er—'e may like beer better, but 'e is fond of 'er, in 'is way. 'E'd do a lot ter make her 'appy. Wot would you do if you was 'im?"

"Lord knows!" said I. "What would you do?"

"Oh, gawd knows!" said the Super, desperately, "you see . . . I'm him!" . . .

I know it was wrong to have his tankard refilled—but I ask you, what else could I do? Anyhow, I did it.

SCREEN VALUES

"The Card."

Ideal.—Starring Laddie Cliff, supported by Mary Dibley, Dora Gregory, Norman Page, Arthur Cleave, Sydney Paxton, Fransi Carlos, Joan Barry, Jack Denton, E. Colman Rashleigh, Richard Atwood, Jean Wilson, Hilda Cowley, Bob Ballis, and Frank Goddard.—Directed by A. V. Bramble.—Scenario by Eliot Stannard.

THERE has rarely been a screen adaptation of a famous novel which has so completely rendered the atmosphere of the original, as the Ideal production of Arnold Bennett's work. It is a supreme test of the director's ability, for Bennett has created with meticulous care a character, which in its development from the chrysalis to the butterfly, is consistent in its sturdy, egotistical, humorous, pushful humanity. It is the true Denry Machin on the screen, and perhaps the chief merit lays in the happy choice of Laddie Cliff in the title rôle. This recruit simply lived the part, and is a standing exception to the rule about film actors with only stage experience, for never once did he strike a false note, or ever convey the suggestion of acting, in the theatrical sense.

The casting director has been equally adept with all the supports. The story is, as everyone knows, about the self-making of a man, in the hard and frequently sordid petty society of a Pottery town; his obstacles and his resourcefulness in surmounting them. To portray this adequately, the consistent representation of his environment and his neighbours is essential, and throughout, the work is of the highest class.

Mary Dibley is the Countess of Chell, and she and the Earl, E. Colman Rashleigh, as the aristocrats of the place, have more or less conventional parts to play, and as foils to the petty snobs around them, score heavily. The typical provincial big-wigs, are played by Sydney Paxton, Fransi Carlos, Norman Page and others, in excellent style, and one of the best character studies, played in a minor key, we have seen for some time is contributed by Dora Gregory, as "The Card's" toil-worn mother. Hilda Cowley and Joan Barry are also extremely good.

There have been liberties taken with the book—one group of incidents will be badly missed; and another entirely new adventure is brought in. Denry discovers a "white hope," but this is done in such characteristic style and is so harmonious with the general treatment of the story, that its intrusion can scarcely be resented. Incidentally, it brings in Frank Goddard, the boxer, who has little straight acting to do, however.

preliminaries having been gone through, or rather poured out.

"You mean the lady who just left you?" I inquired.

"Umm!" grunted the Super into his beer. I shook my head in a polite negative. The Super came up to breathe. "That was Kate Tolyer!" he said impressively.

I'm afraid I didn't look sufficiently impressed.

"Meanter say, as you don't know 'er?" he almost gasped.

"I'm afraid—" I began, apologetically.

"Where 'ave you lived?" said the Super, scornfully. "Sometimes I'm almost tempted ter give yer up. If it wasn't that yer seems willing ter learn, I believe I would."

"I'm ever anxious to learn," I pleaded humbly.

"Well, that's somethin'," approved the Super. "Not much, but somethin'. First time anybody asked me if I liked beer, I said I was willing ter learn"—"and I been learnin' ever since," he added almost sadly.

"But surely you do like it," said I.

"Well," said the Super, thoughtfully, "up to about the eighth I'm too thirsty to be critical, from there to the nineteenth I gradjally realise I've over-rated it, and after that, well it's too late ter mix yer drinks, and it's got into a sort of 'abit . . . But about Kate Tolyer—surely you know 'er? . . . Why she plays all the 'weeping mothers for the Simplex Film Co. Steady job she 'as."

"Weeping mothers!" I said in amazement.

"Of course!" said the Super. "It'd be a pretty poor film if they didn't 'ave a baby took with croup, or the sailor son brought 'ome bruised and broken, or the starving 'eroine dropped over a cliff or something. Well they all got mothers, ain't they? And

This week we print rejoinders to articles that have appeared in previous issues of the "Studio." H. R. Barbor, the Editor of the "Actor," endeavours to re-utle claims made in the recent article on "Organising the Artistes," and the Hon Solicitor of the Club explains the legal aspect relating to the unpaid subscriptions of Club members.

"ORGANISING ARTISTES"

I trust you will allow me the courtesy of your columns to reply to Ess Jee's disagreement with me on the subject of the organisation of film artistes. I am, I trust, not so optimistic a journalist as to endeavour to discuss the whole enormous problem of film actors' organisation in a half-column article.

You asked my opinion on a specific question and I endeavoured to give it to you, and frankly I can find nothing in Ess Jee's reply which refutes my contention or seeks to refute it. My contention, which was that while an organisation exists and is in a position to do all that can possibly be considered necessary for the betterment of the working conditions of kinema actors, it is a stupid waste of money and energy, as well as a dissipation of moral force, to set up another organisation.

Ess Jee rides very easily over the points and, instead of suggesting why the A.A. is unable to look after the interests of film artistes, he proceeds to make what is in my opinion an unwarranted attack on two organisations, both of which are doing magnificent work for the general uplifting of the entertainment industry and for the furtherance of the cause of artistes.

As I stated in my note to you, the A.A. has repeatedly assisted film actors, a great number of whom are members of the A.A. It sought to draw up a contract for the equitable governance of the less-paid screen artistes. It has spent a great deal of thought and money in the interests of its film-actor members. The setting up of another body would simply mean the multiplying of card indexes, from which only the stationers and office fitters would benefit.

I am glad that Ess Jee is so ignorant of the organisation of the stage that he announces that the A.A. rigidly excludes kinema artistes from the stage. I feel that he may be inclined to come along some time to the A.A. offices to learn a little of the inside working of that institution. Ess Jee's statement that there is an imperative need for the kinema artistes to organise in self-defence makes me believe that not only has he got hold of the right end of a stick, but that his co-operation with the A.A. might well be of value.

The whole entertainment industry suffers from the evil typified by Ess Jee's reference to the "ex draper's counter-jumper" in the leading part, and the "much boomed ex-bus conductor as director." These destructive potentates of the studio can obviously only be sent where they belong by the artistes who know their job, and are content with nothing less than their job.

If Ess Jee knows how to hurry along the happy day when film actors will have the monopoly of their labour-power and the wits to make use of that monopoly, he will be conferring a great boon not only on the film department, but on the whole entertainment industry.

In any case, I shall look forward to meeting him with a view to discussing the co-operation which, I foresee, is imminent.—H. R. BARBOR.

"CLUB SUBS"

Will you grant me space to criticise your criticisms of the Executive Committee of the Kinema Club on the subject of subscriptions in arrear, and please accept my assurance that I am not appearing as an apologist for the Committee, as no apology is necessary for this body that is endeavouring to carry out the rules of the Club.

I agree with you that probably your construction of the rule, which is set out fully in Rex Davis' letter, is the correct one, but, on the other hand, the reading involving May 6 instead of April 6 is quite a possible reading. Therefore, the Committee would be running grave risks in posting a defaulter whilst there existed a doubt as to the legal position.

I think you should advise the Committee not to run the risk of proceedings, considering that the amount to be recovered from the defaulting Founder Members would be a very small proportion of the £300 to which you refer as being outstanding for subscriptions, when by waiting a very few weeks the position of the committee can be rendered certain.—THE HON SOLICITOR.

Getting the Focus

Telegrams—Southernwood,
Rand, London.
Telephone—
Gerrard 9870.

May 6, 1922

IT is one of the little tragedies of life and work that very often the man of genius who is responsible for a masterpiece dies in a garret. There is something wrong with the adjustments of circumstance that the limelight falls on everybody but the right persons. A star is cheered to the echo for her brilliant dialogue but the author who wrote the lines sits obscure in the stalls. A musician is lionised; the hack who wrote his popular numbers cannot pay his rent. The whole town talks of a comedian's clever gags and songs: his lyric writer wears the same suit that he wore five years ago. And so it goes on: the tragedy of the worker who goes through life unwept, unhonoured and unsung: a state of affairs that is to be seen even in the film world where a star gets an excellent press for a performance that was absolutely made by the sympathetic work of the supporting cast.

BUT it is not the subject of stars that we are discussing; we have more particularly in mind the cameraman whose technical knowledge and experience are brought to bear on a production to such an extent that what might have been a crude photoplay becomes a gem of photographic art. There has not yet been a disposition correctly to appraise the work of a good cameraman. The trade and the public seem to have got a wrong perspective when viewing films; they admire the star and applaud the author, they may even in their more reflective moments compliment the director, but never a thought is given to the man in whose hands is the power to nullify the abilities of the best artiste and destroy the work of the most skilful director.

IT is perhaps due to ignorance, perhaps to thoughtlessness, perhaps to sheer wantonness, that this perverted sense of values obtains. Whatever may be the cause, the fact remains that it is in the best interests of the British producing industry that the status of our cameramen should be established and their work recognised and given correct appreciation. For, be it noted, that whereas British artistry, direction and continuities may suffer by comparison with that of America, our kine-photography is usually as good as, and often better than, the American. In fact, it can truthfully be said that the photography has saved many a British production. In view of these facts we claim that the cameraman should be given the prominence, priority and publicity that is his rightful due. And this claim we make not for the sake of the cameraman but of the British industry in general. For if the photography of British productions is such an important factor it is obviously to the good of the industry and the Captains of Film Industry, to encourage the man behind the camera. To this end we assert that directors must begin to give their cameraman (who is an invaluable asset to them even on the floor) recognition on the screen. The name of the cameraman should go wherever the name of the director goes ;

Q Courage is the thing, says Barrie. All goes if courage goes. And that is true in every sphere of life.

What is needed badly by most folks is a dual courage: courage to make a decision and courage to put that decision into effect. And the man who possesses this dual courage is the man who gets there.

Q If you desire to be written down as a failure all you need to do is to lose this dual courage. All goes if courage goes.

and the name of the director should go wherever the name of the star goes. On synopsis and on main title there should be the name of the cameraman.

THERE is another matter that concerns the cameramen and that is their Society, the K.C.S. We suggest that A. E. Newbould, M.P., who looks after the interests of the industry in Parliament, should approach the Home Secretary with the view of getting the K.C.S. officially recognised. The difficulty of the Home Office when permits are required by cameramen would then be removed, for all that would have to be done would be for the Home Office to issue permits through the K.C.S. Hitherto, there has been an obstructionist element among the public authorities but this may have been due to the fact that the authorities have not been convinced of the bona-fides of the cameraman. If the K.C.S. is officially recognised by the Home Secretary, this difficulty would be removed. For this state of affairs to be assured it will be necessary for every cameraman in the country to become a member of the Society. This course we strongly recommend to every non-member if only for the strength that unity affords. And in so saying it must not be supposed that we necessarily agree with the President's remarks at the Dinner, when he rejoiced that the Society had no desire to be a fighting trade union. The fact is that the Society is a registered trade union and so long as its President takes this non-fighting attitude just so long can the cameramen expect to be over-ridden by their employers. Cameramen have obtained the little they have through fighting; they have lost much through passivity and inertia; their hope for the future is centred in their fighting power and in their readiness to use that power.

IT is too early to refer fully to the suggestion by the Actors' Association to form an Academy where film acting can be taught, but we are inclined to the view that the A. A. and the stage should look after its own affairs and leave the Kinematograph profession to do the same. There seems to be an embarrassing readiness on the part of all sorts and conditions of men to "improve the standard of film acting." Even the Faculty of Arts is considering "the demand for an Amateur Film Society as an aid to finding talent." We recently dealt with the Amateur Film Production Academy in these columns. No one who knows the first things about the profession agrees with such a venture, but where angels fear to tread the film critic of the Daily Mail rushes in. This young man has only recently succeeded Arthur Weigall and so his ignorance is explained. He writes: "As evidence of the more serious way in which people are beginning to regard the kinema, it may be worth mentioning that an Amateur Film Production Academy has been formed." If the "Film Critic" really thinks this then he ought to go back to school.

Intimate Studio Gossip

Donald Crisp has gone over to International Artists, and is to remake "Lark's Gate." This will be the first of a series of Donald Crisp Productions which he intends to make without stars. There are a number of existing contracts already in hand, and it has not yet been definitely decided whether the same cast will appear in this production or whether an entirely new one will be engaged.

The old London Studio, now the Alliance, looks quite like it did of old since Harold Shaw has returned. I took a trip over to the studio last Tuesday and was impressed by the co-operation of the artistes, director, cameraman and staff; all working together and seemingly getting good results. Shaw tells me that Harley Knoles has made things very comfortable for him down there; there is no hurrying the director or arguing about a little extra expense; things go along smoothly without interruption. Perhaps some of our other studios might turn out more acceptable productions if they worked on these lines and gave the director half a chance. Shaw is working on "Love and the Whirlwind."

That good British films would be very acceptable to exhibitors is proved by the remarks made by two or three prominent men on the exhibiting side at various functions last week. Lord Ashfield, chairman of the Provincial Cinematograph Theatres, Ltd., one of the biggest chain of picture houses in the kingdom, at the company's general meeting, appealed for more British films, and promised directors that his company would support good British films if they could be obtained. Captain Barber, of the C.E.A., at the Cameramen's Dinner, also got on to the subject of British films, and said that exhibitors were always ready to pay a little extra for films made in this country, because they found that there was a demand for British films and that the public wanted them.

Victor Seastrom returned to Sweden last Saturday, having been kept busy during his short stay in London interviewing numerous English artistes for his next two big Swedish productions. He has only fixed Matheson Lang for his film, but it is quite probable that he will engage a number of other English artistes. Lang goes to Sweden on July 25 and will be there for about a month. He expresses himself as being very interested in the work of the Swedish artistes, and after witnessing a private view of Seastrom's latest production declared that it was the best picture he had so far seen.

What might be described as a "consonantal coincidence" is the fact that Adrian Brunel and Annette Benson, who returned from film work in Morocco recently, are both interested as director and leading lady respectively in a Globe film entitled

IN THREE YEARS

OVER three years ago, there gathered together at the Emile Restaurant, a company of cameramen who were destined to be the founders of the Kine-Cameramen's Society. The meeting was brought about chiefly by the efforts of George Woods-Taylor, Jack Wiggins, Bert Bloomfield, and Kenneth Gordon, and it was decided that cameramen should form themselves into a Society, so that they could hold lectures and discussions on cinematography and thus improve their work.

Another meeting was held at Brown's, in Shaftesbury Avenue. This one bore a remarkable resemblance to an Army canteen, as at that time most of the members were still in the Army and just about to be demobilised. At this meeting the rules were drawn up and the Society was really started, with Jack Wiggins as first president.

From Brown's the Society's headquarters were shifted to the Queen's Head, near Piccadilly Circus. Here the first dinner of the Society was held, with Henry Saunders as the new president and George Woods-Taylor as secretary. The dinner was a huge success. The only trouble being that the room was not large enough to accommodate all those anxious to be present.

The Society's headquarters were then moved to Patinae's, in Wardour Street, and on the advice of the Society's solicitors it was formed into a Trade Union. A meeting was also held to decide on a minimum wage for cameramen, but it was ultimately decided that the cameramen would lose their individuality if minimum wages were fixed, so that idea was dropped.

The Second Annual Dinner was held at Molinay's, when many Trade celebrities were present.

The period before and after the second Annual Dinner was an eventful one for the Society. Just before the Dinner it became a registered Trades' Union, then came the dinner and the following day came the news that Farrow's Bank had suspended payment and that the Society's funds, which were lodged in that bank, were as good as gone.

The past year was a bad one for Cameramen and it took all the endeavours of the Society's officers to hold it together. George Woods-Taylor had to go away to India and Kenneth Gordon was elected secretary in his absence.

"The Temporary Lady," which was to be shown at the Shaftesbury Pavilion this Thursday. The story of the "Temporary Lady," which is an excellent example of the two-reel comedy feature so much in demand, is the work of Mr. Brunel, the director of several of A. A. Milne's specially written film comedies, one of which, "The Bump," is now showing at the Poly Cinema. Miss Benson, who appears in "The Temporary Lady" as a servant girl, a young man about town and a smart lady, lends the film the unusual distinction of appearing almost continuously throughout its length from start to finish. Supporting her are Miles Mander, Eileen Munro and Arthur Claremont. Most of the scenes were taken in and around London, and include some especially interesting "shots" of Lincoln's Inn Fields, Edgware Road, Bond Street and other famous thoroughfares.

Discussing gauging the value of comedy scenes when acted in the studio, Walter Forde mentions that he always mistrusted scenes which made the studio hands laugh. In his last two films the picture house audience has laughed at scenes which left the studio hands absolutely cold. Now if they laugh at any of his comedy business in the studio he considers that it's no good. "Walter's Trying Frolics," which shows Forde in a dual rôle, is released next week.

I happened to be one of those fortunate enough to witness the exciting Battle of Wardour Street which occurred on Monday last. The trouble started when Pathé's cameramen decorated the front of the Pathé building with banners and flags, captured from the Topical Budget operators at the Cup Final. Topical Budget responded by hanging a dead rooster, decorated in crepe, out of its window. Then followed a fight for possession of the rooster, and Pathé's men were successful in lassoing it. During these hostilities it is pleasing to note that the whole affair was carried out in a good natured manner.

SUPER PHILOSOPHY

by HUGH E. WRIGHT

VIII.—Exteriors

"LIFE on the Film," said the Super, succinctly, "is one damn sub-title after another, and it takes a artis' ter think of suitable language."

He raised his tankard to his lips and drank deeply, I noted that the movement of his arm seemed slower, stiffer than usual; and a spasm of pain shot across his mobile features.

"Rheumatism?" I inquired, sympathetically.

"Elbers!" he answered, shortly. "Or rather what was elbers. Wot they are now, Gawd knows! More like lumps of swollen cat's-meat. I won't be able to lean against a bar properly for months."

This was tragic. "Leaning," I knew was justly one of his pet accomplishments.

"What on earth have you done to them?" I asked.

"Exteriors!" he answered, cryptically. "Film exteriors! And 'ave you ever noticed when you're on exteriors that the Director seems to forget that you got a interior at all. Two fat 'am sandwiches, and a cooling draught from the brook, if there is one, ain't sustenance that I can be emotional on personally. It may suit some people, o' course, but it leaves me cold—cold and clammy!"

"Have you been playing for the Pictures?" I asked.

"Playing for the Pictures!" he cried, scornfully. "Playing! You do tropical scenes at Shoreham in March with a Sou'wester blowing, and see if you call it 'Playing!' With the Director telling you ter be emotional without breathing 'cos your breath comes out like steam on the film. Playing! . . . They don't want actors nowadays, they wants deep-sea divers, or performing seals—or somethin'. . . . Playing!"

"You've been to Shoreham?" I suggested.

"Oh, that was only a remark made ong passong," he replied. "As a matter o' fact I jus' come back from Devonshire—Salmouth!"

"I know it!" said I. "A delightful spot."

"For anybody as likes a annosthetic—perhaps," he grunted. "Not enough of the joy de vif for my taste though . . . and the beer. . . ." He left his sentence unfinished; from his tone you might almost have thought that he had left the beer unfinished, too, but that I felt was improbable.

"You don't seemed to be pleased with 'England's Riveria,'" said I.

"I was a shipwrecked mariner," he answered, sadly. "And, believe me, if ever you wants to be shipwrecked, don't choose glorious Devon. Now, Margate's different—they're 'uman at Margate—but Devon . . . I'll tell yer!"

"First we 'as to row across in the ferry boat; then the tides out and we 'as ter climb thirty-seven steps on to dry land. Sea-weedy steps and very dry land—not a sign of one. Being kind-earted and a fool I offered to 'elp the Camera-man—I once ad a 'Brownie.' 'Ave you ever carried a kinema camera up thirty-seven steps. I 'ave—and the tripod. I don't know that if ever I 'ad the choice again between being a shipwrecked mariner or assistant cameraman. I wouldn't choose the first. And there was me being both, out o' sheer nobbles oblige!"

"The other side we finds a 1820 Ford, wot 'ad been through the war, and 'ad the wounds ter show. Seven miles we done in that. And then four mile of cliff-path down on to the rocks—me still carrying the tripod and the camera—only this time they added the reflector to balance me. I've been on the rocks before, but there's always been a pub to 'elp me there, and I've always travelled light. They do things different in Devon. Why they call it glorious beats me. Four mile, without a sign of a beerhouse even. 'Ardly civilised, I call it!"

"'Owever, we get ter the rocks at last, and then comes the shipwrecked mariner stunt. I was supposed to be starving. That was all right—I was. Yer see; 'aving got rid of 'is camera, the camera-man offered ter carry the sandwiches; after a bit they got too 'eavy for 'im, so 'e ate half of 'em. He picked out all the lean ones first!"

"Well, as I say, I was starving, and my mates 'ad ter feed me on limpets. Ever seen a limpet? You 'ave ter kick it off a rock with your boot 'eel; and when you've got it off you wonder why you took the trouble. A snail's a more intelligent animal, and better looking. I spoilt the first take by spitting out the shell. How was I ter know I ought to 'ave worried it out of its shell with my finger-nail?—I wasn't brought up in an aquarium. The second take the sun went in, and the third take the tide washed us out. After about the seventh try limpets as a food 'ad ceased to interest me."

"What do they taste like?" I inquired.

"If you've ever tried indiarubber wot's been pickled in salt-water for about sixty years—you get somewhere near it," he answered. "But even then you miss the tang of bad seaweed, and you want ter sprinkle 'em well with sand first ter bring out the flavour."

"I was soaked through with the tide," he continued, "and when we'd finished, we've got that four-mile tramp up the cliff by way of a night-cap. I mus' say the Director was very kind; 'e give me a extra camera and focussing board ter carry, in case I got a chill; but I wasn't what you might call 'appy when we got back to the hotel."

"A very trying day!" I murmured. "But I still don't quite understand why your elbows are so sore?"

The Super flushed. "It was a temperance hotel, you see," he explained, "and ginger-ale wasn't no good ter me after the day I'd 'ad. So I wandjered down the street and found a beer 'ouse. I misjudged, I own. I own it frankly. Wot with trying to prevent a chill, and ter wash the sand out of my mouth, I must have overstepped. They makes those Devonshire streets so dam narrer!"—he complained bitterly. "They ain't wide enough ter take a decent load along . . . and the beer wasn't good—honest! I didn't so much walk 'ome—I rickoshetted. Rough stone the 'ouses are, and when I woke up in the morning, I 'adn't enough skin on my elbers ter cover a postage stamp. Glorious Devon! . . . I'm fed up with Devon. Give me London!"

I gave him as much as he could get into a tankard, and left him, sorrowing.

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"Tangled Hearts."

Anchor (Alliance)—Starring Gertrude McCoy and G. H. Mulcaster.—Supported by Maresco Marisini, Henderson Bland and Peter Upcher.—Directed by W. Humphreys. — Scenario by Adrian Johnson.—Photography by Jack Ross.

IN expressing an opinion as to the merits or demerits of this film, one must mention that it is now over two years old, and judged with the work turned out at that time is comparatively good. Even in that short space of time, the profession has advanced by leaps and bounds, so that with a present-day British production, "Tangled Hearts" can only be classed as average.

It is one of the early Alliance productions, and was originally called "The Wife Whom God Forgot." William Humphreys has handled the artistes and the story quite well, but the whole thing is along conventional lines, and opportunities have been missed in some of the big scenes.

There is little fault to be found with the acting. Gertrude McCoy has been well cast, and is quite equal to the important rôle she has been given in the film.

G. H. Mulcaster gives a good performance as the husband, and is able to hold his own in the big scenes.

Peter Upcher is badly cast as the villain, and is not good in the part.

Maresco Marisini submits a convincing and realistic performance as an Arab, and Henderson Bland is quite good as the man who befriends Sylvia. The rest of the artistes, whose names have been omitted from the cast, give excellent interpretations of their various rôles.

Little fault can be found with Adrian Johnson's adaptation of Cecil Bullivant's novel. In its present condition the picture is too long, and some of the incidents working up to the climax could be cut. This may not, however, be the fault of the scenarist.

Jack Ross has secured some exceedingly fine exteriors, but his interior work has only resulted in spoiling the elaborate and beautiful sets. His lighting of interiors could be considerably improved, and no doubt is by this time, for the picture was taken two years ago, when such photography would have been considered good.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION.—Good.

LEADS.—Excellent.

SUPPORTS.—Fine.

LITERARY.—Well adapted.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—Variable.

INTERIORS.—Superb sets.

EXTERIORS.—Well chosen.

"Cocaine."

Master—Starring Hilda Bayley with Flora Le Breton, supported by Tony Frazer, Ward MacAllister, Teddy Arundell, and Cyril Raymond.—Directed by Graham Cutts.—Scenario by Frank Miller.—Photography by T. R. Thumwood.

IF this is judiciously cut and the action consequently speeded up, this will be one of the best products of British studios this year. It possesses certain elements that more than counter-balance the few defects that are apparent. And the worst defect is the amount of footage wasted, particularly in the first reel. The Club dancing scenes in this reel are unnecessarily protracted and give a dull start to the film.

The director has, unfortunately, fallen between two stools: he has attempted to melo-dramatise a piece of propaganda, and accordingly both propaganda and drama have suffered. The impression gained is that in trying to emphasise (with an expansive, poetical and moralising style that at times is ridiculous) the evils of cocaine, he has failed to develop the dramatic properties of what could have been made a thrilling story. This defect can be minimised by the editor's scissors.

Apart from this adverse criticism, the director is responsible for some really remarkable work that gives evidence of an original mind. Credit should be given for the skilful opening of the film: the electric signs at Piccadilly Circus, flashing in natural colour, are very effective.

There are some redundant sub-titles which should be cut, and it was noticed that in the theatre dressing-room scene Jenny wore two different costumes in the same scene.

Judged from the point of view of the acting, much credit is due to practically all concerned. Hilda Bayley's part is that of Jenny, and is exceedingly difficult by virtue of the fact that the mercurial temperament of a drug-maniac has to be skilfully depicted. Miss Bayley's performance was perfect: she cannot fail to become Britain's equivalent of a certain world-famous American screen star.

Flora Le Breton fills an important and prominent part as the heroine of the story. Here again is a flawless performance. She portrays the varying emotions of wonder, childish pleasure, pique, annoyance, anger and love in rapid succession, and yet with consummate skill. Miss Le Breton is destined for a future even more brilliant than her past career, if this is a criterion of her abilities.

A choice cameo is the performance of Tony Fraser, as the twisted grotesque, crippled Chinaman. In the first place this part is a triumph of make-up, and secondly, his acting is of a very fine quality. He richly deserved the spontaneous applause that broke out over one particular scene.

Teddy Arundell was a little too heavy at times, but Cyril Raymond and Ward MacAllister were quite up to the high standard set by the leads.

The clergyman and "Number Two," were badly played.

Frank Miller's scenario makes a fine basis for a thrilling melodramatic story: he has worked up the crises skilfully.

A particularly creditable feature is the photography. This is as good as the best American, and the laboratory work has contributed to the worth of this feature.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION: Good.

LEADS: Excellent.

SUPPORTS: Very good.

LITERARY: Good scenario.

PHOTOGRAPHY: Excellent.

LIGHTING: Very good indeed.

EXTERIORS: Very picturesque and well chosen.

INTERIORS: Well staged and realistic.

"Diana of the Crossways."

Ideal—Starring Fay Compton and Henry Victor—Supported by J. R. Tozer, Joyce Gaymon, Ivo Dawson, Reginald Fox, J. Fisher White, E. Dagnall, J. Harding Steerman, Pamela Cooper, Hope Tilden, Sylvia Young.—Directed by Denison Cliff.—Scenario by Denison Cliff.—Photography by H. Wheedon.

VERY few could have handled George Meredith's book so well as Denison Cliff has and to such good effect. There is very little action, the picture being entirely dependent upon the acting and the work of the director. It is a good example of a first-class English film.

Cliff has been fortunate with the cast at his disposal, for there is little or no fault to be found with the artistes' work.

Fay Compton is charmingly natural and rises to the big scenes in a manner which calls for unstinted praise. She makes a big hit in this rôle.

Henry Victor gives a wonderfully clear performance and makes the very best of every opportunity given him. His work in this production goes to show that when properly handled he becomes a really great screen artiste.

E. Dagnall gives an exceptionally fine interpretation of the Prime Minister, and Harding Steerman's work as the journalist is without fault, while J. Fisher White acquits himself well during his short stay in the film.

The rest of the cast is of a high standard.

Denison Cliff's scenario works the plot out in a logical and lucid manner and effectively works up to the final climax. The continuity is first class.

H. Wheedon has taken care with the lighting of his sets and has secured some good shots.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION.—Exceptionally fine.

LEADS.—Beyond reproach.

SUPPORTS.—Very fine.

LITERARY.—Excellent.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—Very good.

EXTERIORS.—Pleasing.

INTERIORS.—Good.

"Boy Woodburn."

George Clark—Starring Ivy Duke and Guy Newall—Supported by A. Bromley-Davenport, John Alexander, Mary Rooke, Douglas Munro and Cameron Carr—Directed by Guy Newall.

DECIDEDLY below the standard of previous films from a studio which was rapidly building up an enviable reputation for artistic work. It bears obvious signs of hurried production and careless editing.

There is very little story, and what little there is, is not well told; continuity is scrappy, and a very large proportion of the subject is sheer padding, not always of a very interesting type and sometimes verging on mawkishness.

The appeal lies in the characterisation of one or two of the supports more than in any great sympathy felt for the leads, of whom the male is more or less a passenger, while the girl never quite convinces one of the reality of her character. The country backgrounds are attractive, and there are many amusing and appealing shots of animals, but they are not sufficient to provide entertainment alone, though they would have greatly enhanced the appeal of a good story.

The racecourse scenes are mainly extracts from old Grand National "topicals," with nothing original in them.

SUMMARY.

DIRECTION.—Fair. Detail good, particularly in the animal scenes, but no dramatic balance.

LEADS.—Ivy Duke fair; she does not exactly get the part of a country-bred boy-girl. Guy Newall's part is insignificant.

SUPPORTS.—John Alexander as a stable lad gives the best characterisation in the film and scores the biggest success. A. Bromley-Davenport is good as the eccentric trainer, but the part is theatrical.

LITERARY.—Bad. The scenario has not made the most of a story which needed very good presentation to get over.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—Good generally; poor in the Grand National cut-ins.

INTERIORS.—Adequate.

EXTERIORS.—Picturesque and generally pleasing.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

RATHER an amusing billiard handicap took place on Sunday last. I do not know all the rules under which one could be disqualified; nobody present knew them all, but it gave Tony Fraser, the referee, a better opportunity of disqualifying the billiard aspirants. One rule I do know is that the cue must not touch the floor, neither must the competitor speak during the match. It was practically impossible to comply with the latter rule, as the temptation to speak when a shot is missed can only be adequately described by billiard enthusiasts. The finish of this handicap is to be played to-morrow (Sunday) I would advise all members to turn up at the Club on Sunday evening if they want to be thoroughly amused.

On this page are some scenes drawn in the billiard room by David Robertson, the black-and-white artist. These billiard exponents are easily recognisable by their positions. Tony Fraser can be seen elinging to the table in characteristic style, Harry Worth is also there and so is Alec Fraser. That most of the other habitués of the billiard room are also present, can be taken for granted, as the waiter seems to be having an exceptionally busy time.

SPECIAL GENERAL MEETING

THE Special General Meeting held at the Kinema Club, on Sunday last, was remarkably well attended, and little business was got through in a lot of time.

It was mentioned by the Chairman, George Ridgwell, that another meeting was to be called in about a month's time, but the matters for discussion that evening had to be decided immediately.

The first matter was the question of allowing the newly-formed Motion Picture Directors' Association to have the use of the committee room for its members during the daytime. It was pointed out that by allowing the directors to use the room, it would ensure all members of that Association becoming members of the Kinema Club, a very desirable state of affairs.

It was also mentioned that under the terms in which the Club premises had been secured, no part of the building could be sublet, therefore the Club could not rent the room to the Association.

A resolution was passed that permission be granted the Motion Picture Directors' Association to have the use of the Club committee-room each day (excluding evenings), and the use of one of the other rooms once a month for the purpose of a general meeting.

A great deal of time was wasted on the next matter, giving the Executive Committee power to raise a loan, not exceeding £500. It was pointed out that there were still a great number of the Club's members who had not paid their subscriptions, and if the money owing to the Club in unpaid subscriptions were paid the Club would be solvent. As things were, it was necessary to get some money to keep the Club going until its first production was made.

It was decided that all members who had not paid their subscriptions by Saturday (to-day) would be posted on the Club notice-board, and later would have their names removed from the membership book.

As the rent of the Club premises was payable in June, it was pointed out that it was absolutely necessary for the Club to be allowed to borrow some money, and a resolution was passed empowering the Executive Committee to raise a loan not exceeding £500, repayable at 6 per cent. per annum, the liability of each individual member not to exceed £2 10s.

The matter of forming the Club into a limited liability company resulted in the following resolution being passed:—"That it be referred to a committee, comprising the executive committee and chairman of other committees with power to co-opt, and that after the matter had been gone into by that committee the result should be reported to another general meeting, and that at such meeting an account showing the Club's liabilities, debts, and weekly cost of running the establishment be submitted."

Rex Davis, Chairman of the Entertainment Committee, thanks Billie Bristow for the successful way she had organised the Kinema Club Carnival, and mentioned that as a result of the Carnival a handsome sum would go to the Club's funds.

The Kine Cameramen's Society holds its Third Annual Dinner

Replying to the toast of the Kinematograph Industry, Ernie Blake, of Kodak, said that we were all looking upon the present season as a bad one. It might be a bad one, but every Trade was passing through a bad time; it was not peculiar to the Kinematograph Trade, as many were apt to believe. Knowing something of the inside figures, he was astounded to see the quite healthy state of the Trade. In Italy, France and the Continent the Kinema Trade was practically non-existent.

Referring to America, he thought that we would never get our pictures in there. Occasionally a British film got into the States, but we could never get a proper hold on the American market, because the returns were not adequate. The reason for this was the existence of big combines and trusts. There was, however, a very big opening for British films in the Dominions. The Dominions were so far practically virgin territory for British films, and if properly exploited the British pictures would get a big hold on the people of our colonies.

He was pleased to be present that evening to see that despite all the stagnation of trade, that the Kine-Cameramen's Society was still going on. He had watched the growth of the society, and had marvelled at the many obstacles it had overcome. It was pleasing to him to find that the society was still as robust as ever it was, despite the blow its funds received when Farrow's Bank closed.

He knew that there were many of the society's best men out of employment, and only wished that he could fix them up with work. But he wanted them to keep on plodding away and overcome any obstacles that were set up. If a cameraman turned out good work, it was for his own good, the society's good and the good of the industry.

E. Hawock Booth thought that the Dominions were one of the world's biggest markets, and he knew that, providing we could supply them, British films would be greatly appreciated there.

A. E. Coleby described himself as the black sheep in the fold, being the only director present. It was wonderful to him to see these men congregated together that evening. He had been in the industry nineteen years, and it was the only occasion on which he had seen so many unanimous in their ideas. It pleased him to see at least one branch of the Trade unanimous on something. Every other effort of the kind had fallen through simply because its members were not unanimous. He was in agreement with their ideas, and took that opportunity emphatically to state that it was the man at the handle who counted in the making of the picture. They had not, so far, received the credit due to them, and he had always put it forward that the cameramen should receive more credit.

Capt. Barber, on behalf of the C.E.A., thanked the society for its consideration in inviting a representative of his association. Such gatherings, he thought, did much to encourage esprit de corps among the cameramen. He had always taken a keen interest in the mechanical side, for unless there was technical excellence on the producing side, then the outlook of the exhibitor was a very poor one.

It was lamentable that the exhibitor had to depend upon foreign films for the

The third annual dinner of the Kine-Cameramen's Society, which was also a Welcome Home Dinner to George Woods-Taylor, the secretary, was held on Friday, April 28, at the Holborn Restaurant. The following were present: Henry Saunders, Kenneth Gordon, W. Bool, Bertram Burleigh, Emile Lauste, E. Harvey Harrison, Captain G. W. Barber (C.E.A.), Wallace Bosco, C. Hartley Davies (Cinema), L. Yglesias (Bioscope), H. Hutchison (Kine. Weekly), Ernest G. Allighan (Motion Picture Studio), A. E. Coleby, D. P. Cooper, F. Grainger, E. T. Grant, F. Bourne, A. W. Kingston, George Woods-Taylor, I. Roseman, L. G. Egrot, John Hutchins, F. L. Wilson, F. Danvers, Yates, E. W. Angwin, A. Arch, A. H. Moses, D. Tamperi, F. Hawock Booth, Bert Forde, W. Carrington, E. Hawkins, J. Van Neck, P. Dennis, Leslie Eveleigh, H. Griffin, Gaston Queribet, T. Scales, Frank Bassill, G. Hodgson, Phil Ross, H. Pain, E. Strahler, S. G. Hooper, E. Blake.

running of his show, but financiers in England were not bold enough to put up the money for film producing. After the war we settled down to compete with other countries, but lack of capital and legislation upon legislation had hindered us, and, instead of making headway, the British producing industry was almost moribund. American films were good—he regarded them as technically perfect—but British films must count in the long run. A great deal of responsibility rested with the cameraman; the work of the scenarist, director, artiste was nought if the cameraman was not there with the necessary qualifications.

Before the advent of the kinema, Britain was the home of photography, and there was no reason why cameramen should not be able to turn out work equal to other countries.

He looked upon the Dominions not only as a commercial proposition, but also as a means for furthering British propaganda. The Government had not yet awoke to the possibilities of the camera. It had hitherto never failed to propagate British thought, and yet it had neglected the vast field of possibilities opened up by the kinema in this direction.

Every film was to a certain extent propaganda, and every British film contained some angle of British thought. Yet throughout our Empire not one in every hundred films shown was British. British films with British ideas would, if shown in India, for instance, do a great deal of good. It was all mainly attributable to legislation that British films could not come into their own.

The money for British films came through the British kinema theatre pay-box window. America, with her twenty-five thousand halls, was able to get along nicely and find plenty of capital. But Britain, with every Government obstacle placed in her way and tariff barriers throughout the world, was not in such an enviable position.

The Entertainment Tax was one of the Government obstacles which was closing British studios. Here were thousands of pounds, which should be going into the British studios, going into the pockets of the Government.

In the States it was possible for producing firms to obtain battleships, trains and almost anything. In England, instead of helping, the police and local authorities were trying, by every possible means, to crush the film industry, and unless the various sections of the industry combine it will be legislated with other business.

British film directors are given little opportunity, but he could assure all those present that the exhibitor gave preference to British films, and was always willing to pay a little extra because the picture was British.

Recounting some of the history of the society, President Henry Saunders told how the first annual dinner had been held in the upper room of a saloon bar, the second in a Soho restaurant, and now the third in a place that really befitted the society. He was sorry that the K.M.A., the K.R.S., and the British Motion Picture Directors' Association were not present, but they had missed a very pleasant evening. He thought that the society was progressing on very sound lines, and did not think that it would be necessary for him to again emphasise that the K.C.S. had no Soviet tendencies. There was no wage bar; providing a cameraman could produce good credentials he could become a member of the K.C.S.

He had recently been to America, and the ease with which it was possible to obtain permit made him all the more anxious for the same state of affairs to be brought about in England. The society was trying to raise the status of the cameramen; it had its own interests to look after, but it was always anxious to help the industry as a whole, in whatever way it could.

Alfred Moses, in replying to the toast of the Society, pointed out the many ways in which the Society had helped to advance the tone of British photography. Cameramen who had any difficulty could now come to the society with their troubles, and usually had them solved. Cameramen who had made various little discoveries came to the society and let their brother cameramen into the secret. Before the society existed cameramen had kept to themselves, and anything they found out was also kept to themselves. The big advance in the quality of British photography he claimed was 90 per cent. due to the influence of the society.

George Woods-Taylor, the society's secretary, recently returned from India, said that the success of the dinner was due to the hard work put in by Kenneth Gordon, the acting secretary. The speaker took over the secretaryship when the big boom in films was on. Since then the trade had come through a very bad time, and he was pleased to see that the society was still as powerful as ever. The fame of the society had spread to India, where he met an Italian cameraman, who questioned him about the society and its works. After recounting a number of his experiences in India, he concluded by thanking the members for the manner in which they had welcomed him back.

Kenneth Gordon, the acting secretary of the society, mentioned that a lot of the society's best cameramen were out of work

PHOTOGRAPHIC PHILOSOPHIES

by CRISPIN HAY

CORRESPONDING to its midway position between the West and the East, Morocco combines many of the characteristics of the photographic conditions of each. It is midway between the brilliant hardness of, say, India and the softness of, say, England. I am speaking now of Morocco in the winter months—January and February: Morocco in the middle of the summer would, I should think, be an impossible country from the photographic point of view. Even in January, with the average brilliant sun which shines all day long for most days in that month, we find a very big difference between sunshine and shadow. The high lights are apt to be too high, while objects in the picture which lie in the shadow show a strange reluctance to appearing on the negative.

I always think that one of the greatest drawbacks to the countries where the sky is cloudless for days on end is—that the sky is cloudless. One is doomed beforehand to blank white skies in one's picture: there is no chance at all of obtaining delightful cloud studies as a background to one's subjects. On the rare occasions when we got clouds—nice fleecy clouds—without rain I found a graduated light filter extremely useful for obtaining the correct exposure for both sky and foreground.

With respect to unevenly-lit pictures I found the town of Fez extremely difficult. Most of the interesting subjects are to be found in very small and dark shops in incredibly narrow "streets" which, in addition, are sometimes shaded with rough grass awnings stretched ten or twelve feet above the ground. Consequently one half of the picture, and the interesting half, of course, is in pitchy blackness, while the other half may be bathed in brilliant sunshine. In fact, so variable is the actinic quality of the light and so deceptive the shadows that I found it advisable to make tests every day of practically every shot that was taken.

Failing a travelling developing, printing and projecting plant, which is really essential to the satisfactory making of pictures in uncivilised countries, this is the only possible procedure. Otherwise the least slip or smallest error in the photography, remaining undetected until development, may assume nightmare dimensions.

I could write reams and reams about the beauties of Morocco if only the Editor would let me. Ready to one's hand on all sides are the most astonishingly varied types of scenery. Marrakech is absolutely African in atmosphere, while not many miles away one may shoot a scene in what nobody could distinguish from a country lane in Kent. Barren mountains, hard and nothing yielding, frown everlastingly across the richest and gentlest of fertile plains, where man and beast spend their peaceful lives in a primitive and honest tilling of the soil. Perhaps the most beautiful sight—alas! not photographic—that I saw was Marrakech at night, with the silent silvery Atlas mountains standing sentinel between the coastal plain and the wild interior, and over all the moon, inconceivably blue, bathing everything in its soft, living blue radiance.

That sight I shall never forget.

"TRADE PRINTING"

How Good Negatives are Spoiled, and the Remedy

In a recent issue we dealt on the "Focus" page with an evil that is having disastrous effects on the work of British studios—trade printing. We pointed out the results of dilatory work in trade laboratories, and suggested that no studio should be complete without its own laboratory. We give below two replies that we have received; one from C. J. Capper, and the other from a well-known cameraman, who writes:—

"Laboratory work is bad, and I do not wonder at it, when three-parts of the Trade factories employ unskilled labour (girls and juniors), with small experience, say, of one or two years in the business and no knowledge of photography.

"Behind the developing tank, the printing machine, etc., should be a thoroughly capable man, with a knowledge of photography as a basis, so that he may see exactly what the cameraman is aiming at, by the density, tone values, etc., thereby helping to reproduce an artistic picture.

"This I know to be true, as I have personally made a speciality of laboratory work, both still and kine., for over twelve years (having been employed by most of the leading companies since Charles Urban days), therefore I know, have seen and worked side by side with these poor mechanical human workers.

"Why are they employed? Cheapness is one answer, 'friends of the manager' is another. Quality, they have only heard of; its exact definition they know not, bar perhaps a light or dark print on the screen.

"Some cameramen cannot carry their work through the branches of the dark-rooms. And while this continues, the high standard of quality will never be reached, and such experienced men as myself will still be unemployed. I am sorry for cameramen, as their work is being carelessly treated."

C. J. CAPPER writes:—

With reference to your issue of April 15 re "Trade Printing," I was delighted to see your remarks, and endorse every word, especially your statement that a cameraman should be able to do his own developing and printing. I am convinced that in the majority of cases the cameraman would be able to have his first print to his own satisfaction, and then any criticism of the photography would fall on his own shoulders, and not on about half a dozen other departments that sometimes get unjustly blamed. For any future prints there would be the original to copy and improve where possible.

At the present time the printer has no idea of what is expected from a negative, and has to use his own discretion—which is very often wrong. The same thing occurs where part of a negative is developed in pyro pyro metol and the remainder in tryetol-hydrokinone, making an entirely different exposure for the printer, which is hardly recognisable during the printing.

In the early days very few photographers would have thought of letting anyone develop their negative; most photographers wanted to make the first print or see the tests before sanctioning them for printing, and so obviating any mistakes that is so simple to make. In the majority of up-to-date studios all these facilities are quite possible, and should be done by every zealous photographer who wishes to see his finished picture a success and a credit to all concerned.

K.C.S. DINNER (continue from page 13).

as a result of so many of the big firms closing down, but applications were coming in daily for cameramen, and he believed that he was right in saying that things were on the mend.

The society has a membership of 98, with members in America, India, South Africa and the Argentine, and in its ranks were Italians, Americans, English, Scotch, Irish, and Frenchmen. The society had now been going on for three years, and since its inception the photography of British pictures was going up by leaps and bounds.

The Kinema Club had been of great assistance to the K.C.S., for most of the directors who are members got their cameramen from the ranks of the society.

The society had a good balance at the bank, and was in a very healthy state.

During the evening Bertram Burleigh and Wallace Bosco, assisted by local talent recruited from the ranks of the cameramen, entertained the company, and A. E. Coleby told a number of amusing stories.

Getting the Focus

ELSEWHERE in this issue we commence a series of important articles on the vital subject of film finance. We wish to emphasise the urgency for all who are able to give information that will assist our Propaganda Campaign to get in touch with this office at once. There is no personal axe grindable in this matter. The benefit of the individual is absorbed in the greater matter of the good of the industry. There are producing firms of high repute which are, in fact, bulwarks of the industry, and which are at this moment ready to crumble to the dust of failure. Bankruptcy stares the industry in the face and we should be guilty of a crime if we attempted to gloss over the situation by false and fatuous optimism. The time has come courageously to face the facts; to ascertain the causes of the present distressful state of affairs and to have these causes remedied. Being, as the STUDIO is, the only journal solely devoted to the British producing industry, it is only our duty to lead the way in this vital matter. The plan of campaign is to interest the financial world in the industry and to invite it to appoint a commission of inquiry into the stability of our industry.

JIMMY WHITE, that hard-headed Yorkshireman and successful business man, was right when at the Twenty Club dinner he told his auditors blankly that they must set their house in order before they asked financiers to invest. We are inclined to the view that those who so plainly invited Mr. White and Mr. Burbidge financially to support the film industry were not only guilty of a breach of good taste but also a breach of good tactics. Financiers are not philanthropists but their business sense is so acutely developed that they will not hesitate to invest in an industry that can prove itself fairly capable of good returns. And this we know the British film industry can do. We appeal to the head of every producing concern to line up with us in this supreme effort to save the industry. Give us facts and figures to prove the case that we are making and we will act as the publicity agent of the industry. We ask this solely in the interests of the firms themselves for if the British producing industry is not saved for the British the Americans will, with their more plentiful money, obtain control of it and take it out of the hands of the firms who now possess it.

LAST week we casually referred to the project of the Actors' Association to form an academy for teaching screencraft. On behalf of the film profession we warn off the A.A.; the film profession is as capable of looking after itself as the A.A. is of looking after the stage fraternity. None admire the work of the A.A. more than we. The status of the theatrical profession has been elevated mainly by the efforts of the Q Get your teeth well in and hang on. No one can really defeat you but yourself.

Association ; and indirectly and incidentally the film profession has also benefited. But we must point out that the film profession has grown until now it is far too big and with too many important considerations involved for any outside agency to interfere. And the very fact that the A.A. is lacking in statesmanship to such a lamentable degree that it talks of teaching film work, at once proves its incapacity either to grasp the conditions of the film profession or to legislate for it. At the moment there is no room in our profession for "gifted amateurs" or graduates from the stage whose success in the theatrical profession is problematic. That puts the position as plainly as we know how. When our industry gets a big move on the opportunity for a film academy may present itself and when it does it will not be necessary for the A.A. to deal with the matter. If, and when, a film academy is necessary the right organisation to proceed with the matter will be either the Kinema Club or the inevitable Kinema Artistes Federation.

IN four weeks' time the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO will have completed its first year of publication. That, in itself, is an achievement of which we are justifiably proud for to live through the past twelve months is proof of the capacity of living through anything. With all the odds against us we have succeeded in supplying the British film producing industry with a weekly journal which not only interests or records the movement of personnel but which instructs and, we hope, helps raise the status of the profession. In the brief space of twelve months we have, we are gratified to know, afforded an impetus to the profession to say nothing of originating the Club idea. To mark the occasion we are publishing on June 3, an Anniversary Double Number. This will contain special articles by leading men in the industry as well as reports from Germany, America, Sweden, Italy, and France. There will be several special advertising features and as the Double Number will be circulated throughout every British and American studio, as well as the majority of Continental studios, this will be unique publicity service and excellent personal propaganda, of which everyone engaged in British productions will desire to take advantage.

DURING this distressful period in the profession there is need for an aggressive spirit on the part of all. It is of no use sitting down under the blows. The exhibitors discovered this during the slump of last summer. They fought the slump by advertising extensively and improving the programs they offered. And this aggressive policy must be adopted by everyone in the profession, Fight the hard times by additional efforts and increased personal service. The reward will come.

DIAGNOSIS AND PRESCRIPTION

by M. P. PROUT

THERE is no shortage of physicians willing to diagnose the diseases from which the films are suffering. What we want now are a few etiologists and some operating surgeons.

Sidney Morgan ably locates the scenario trouble. We all know that "scenarios" can be roughly divided into synopses and continuities; but it is not so generally known that, whereas a comparatively large number of persons, including some authors, are capable of writing filmable synopses, the construction of a good working scenario is a more difficult matter and requires some knowledge of a much talked of but little understood subject—film technique—possessing certain characteristics.

Screen art is just as distinct a form of art as music. The brain that can assimilate a generous measure of film technique is, like the highly musical ear, congenital. Stage art may be a greater or lesser form of art, but is equally a distinct form.

Our films captains may resist this fact as long as they like—and probably will, but just so long will the screen remain a mongrel mixture of extraneous arts without either individuality or scope.

Eminent authors have made a lot of money out of films, but as scenarists they have not made good. The blame is not to the authors but to those who, had they known something of film technique, would have tumbled to the fact that the ability to write a readable book and the ability to construct a suitable scenario have no common factor.

These abilities exude from different kinds of grey matter. God made it so. And no living soul can say why.

To imagine that a few visits to a film studio will enable anyone to master film technique is just unadulterated stupidity. Can film technique be learned at all in a film studio? Note the first efforts of a director and his repeated efforts in after years. As far as film technique is concerned retrogression is the rule—that or a dead level of artlessness. Heaps of experience will teach nothing of a subject requiring a special mentality to a man devoid of that mentality.

In an article which I recently wrote for the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO, I pointed out how the mental organisation of a stage producer rendered him particularly unreceptive of the qualities which go to the making of a film director. Evidence of staging is one of the worst evils of the screen, and a man who cannot see the difference between a scene staged and a scene photographically set is past praying for. History will record of him that he "mistook his vocation," and will perhaps further record that "one gentleman, more astute than the rest, Jeffrey Bernerd by name, was heard to say,

'There is not a first-rate director in the country'; but this was subsequently proved to be only true in respect of those at the time in the film trade."

But I was speaking of scenarios. Now I get a great number of these, from published books to almost illegible manuscripts, sent to me for perusal and comment. It is a time-consuming and heart-breaking job. But among them I occasionally find a good film theme or plot, one that I would be quite willing to spend a few weeks adapting if there were any market for the finished product.

What chance is there of finding among those who regard any silly novel as worth filming one capable of appraising the value of weeks of work of a kind they don't understand? Far better, as Sidney Morgan suggests, to get on with something else.

(I note that a prize of £500 is now being offered for the best filmable synopsis sent in. The adjudicating committee include "prominent representatives of the Stage and Literature." What has the Stock Exchange and the Motor Industry done?)

The next complaint is lack of art. Hear the words of George Pearson—perhaps our most skilled diagnostician—"We do not want more capital so much as brains and art."

There's good horse sense in this, but, are these monosyllabic desiderata to come from within or without? If from within, let Heaven be our help. If from without, how?

Film studios have been invaded in turn by various specialists—authors, artists, architects, etc.—all "eminent" in their respective spheres, all fired with zeal to help.

Sometimes this scramble for floor space takes an amusing turn. A super crank of my acquaintance, for example, actually urges (on the plea, I believe, that a film studio is really a photographic studio) that some floor space should be reserved (as has long been done in Sweden, and is now being successfully tried in Germany) for a photographer. Now, although we must concede that this man's long and varied experience of the art of photography enables him instantly and surely to recognise the work of a photographer when he sees it—"the delicate mechanism of a watch is not made by a plumber," are his words—yet members of the film producing confraternity will readily see the absurdity of his proposition.

But this very absurdity has prompted me—starting from the assumption that instinct is sometimes a surer guide to conduct than logical reasoning—to devise a method of testing whether any specified type of eminence is likely to be helpful or not.

AN IDEAL IDYLL

Raleigh King announces the completion of his new film "Creation," which has been made entirely at Torquay under the direction of Humberstone Wright. All the artistes who have taken part in the film have now returned to London.

In the quietude of the Devonshire countryside, the artistes have been at work in a studio, which is like a miniature English Hollywood—for once in the studio grounds, the artistes practically lived in this film colony until the film was finished.

With the fresh breezes blowing in from the sea, which bounds the studio grounds on the south, the artistes work unmolested by outside influences, devoting all their time and thoughts to the film in course of production. A happier company than that working on the first Raleigh King production, it would have been hard to find. The soft green-clad hills bound the studio on the east, and a great red rock, known as the Giant rock, stands sentinel on the west, whilst within the studio grounds are to be found Italian rose gardens, tropical plants, a beautiful and well-filled conservatory, a fish pond, and tennis lawns.

The great old-fashioned house provides service for an hotel, offices, and printing, developing, and joining rooms. All the leading artistes in the film lived on the premises, together with the director and studio hands.

Raleigh King, from whom this company takes its name, is the moving spirit in the little film colony. At one time a stage actor, he gave up his career to join the Army, and the absence of two of his fingers gives evidence of the fact that he saw action at Loos and on the Somme. On demobilisation he went to India, where he interested himself in coffee-planting. A bonny son aged eighteen months demanded that he should return to the Old Country, however, and after a holiday visit to Torquay, he conceived the idea of forming a film company, which should devote its time to the making of films in the clear atmosphere of glorious Devon.

Dorothy Fane plays Zena in "Creation"; Frank Dane plays opposite her; Sir Simeon Stuart appears as the Doctor; while Raleigh King, Francis Peyton, who is rapidly coming to the fore in British films, Beryl Norton, a young actress who has played in three Australian films, Kate Gurney, W. A. Freshman, and Thelma Murray enact the other parts.

The test is applied in this way. Introduce an eminent craniologist or numismatist into the studio. There will be no difficulty, judging by precedent, in finding a pretext—some way in which he can be helpful in film producing. You will find that he will be welcomed with such an excess of urbanity that he may even be not a little embarrassed.

Now test the wild assertion of my cranky friend and introduce a pictorialist photographer. (I understand there are about a dozen among the professional photographers; rather more among the amateurs—but more difficult to find; none in the film world.) If he be treated with the same urbanity, the man is useless. If, on the other hand, his brains plus art are the kind the film trade is thirsting for, then, let his knowledge be ever so profound, his voice ever so timid, his bearing humility itself, his presence will create a melee.

Try him out; wear down the opposition, for instinct is in this case a safe guide; hold him with bands of steel, for, as the advertisements say, "there's a reason."

Intimate Studio Gossip

This week Maurice Tourneur arrived from America to direct "The Christian" for Goldwyn. He will stay here for about six weeks and commence work immediately on exteriors in the Isle of Man, Soho and Epsom Downs. For this purpose he will be engaging several crowds and small part players; the leading parts will be played by Richard Dix and May Busch, who are due to arrive from America to-morrow. Already he has ful natural scenery in Ireland and on the Continent, to say nothing of the historic places in England and Scotland. In addition to this, London is the hub of the British Empire and the centre for stories, plays and other literary material for films."

Have you made arrangements to be represented in our Anniversary Double Number?

I learn that W. H. Baker, of the Diamond Film Company, has bought from Nellie Tom Gallon the film rights of her late brother's popular novel, "A Rogue in Love," which was the subject that the old London Films had just completed when the studio fire occurred and the negative was lost. It will be very interesting to see this film remade by Diamond.

During the week I heard of a choice piece of information. A well-known man in the film producing world of five years ago has arranged to start a new production. He saw one of our leading directors, and it was expected that the latter should direct the picture but the decision would be made the next day. This director calls the following day and learns that another man had been engaged in the interim to direct the picture. And this man a few weeks previously had been playing the valet in a film that the director had just finished!

A gentleman of prominence in the American film industry has written me with reference to obtaining an agent in this country. He is an exporter of films and has signed up two good producing concerns in Los. He desires to get British representation; either a man or concern who is financially able to buy his films outright, or a good salesman who can promote the interests of the films he represents. I will gladly put any reader into touch with this gentleman.

The surprising enthusiasm shown by the German public over British film actresses might well be adduced in support of Mr. Griffith's vision of the film as peacemaker. Dorinea Shirley, who returned this week from Berlin, where she was starring in a B.A.T. production, "The White Desert," far from experiencing any hostility from the public, was lionised by the Press, besieged by the modistes and entertained on more than one occasion by Prince Joachim Ernst, who is said to have a flair for the screen himself. Backed by English money, using English scenarios, B.A.T. Films employ an international cast and produce in countries where climatic and financial conditions are most favourable. The inability of artistes to understand each other's language makes them more than ever dependent on gesture, and the dramatic effects are enhanced by nearly engaged Leslie Hiscott (late of F.P.-Lasky) as the assistant director. There will be no attempt to "star" the leads, as Tourneur is of the opinion that the most valuable publicity element of the film will be the author's name, and nothing will be done to overshadow Hall Caine.

Tourneur was very definite and explicit to me in reference to the possibilities of this country for film producing. "I consider," he said, "that there is every reason to suppose that this country will become the centre of film producing activities. It is the terminus of all the roads that lead to all the best locations in the world. In thirty-six hours—less time than it takes to get from our New York studios to California—you can get desert scenes in Algiers, gambling sets in Monte Carlo, ice-fields in Northern Scandinavia, glacier mountains in Switzerland, and a wealth of wonder-

WHAT HAVE YOU DONE?

MODESTY, like old ale, is very good in moderation, but you should not let either go to the head. There comes a time when modesty is worse than a blunder.

Take, for instance, yourself. During the past year you have played small parts in several films. Because they are small parts your name was not mentioned on synopsis or main title. No one knew that you had played these parts, and yet the fact that you had worked in so many films is a strong recommendation for you to get further engagements.

In this profession a premium is placed on personal publicity. You absolutely must—for your own sake—tell agents and directors what you have been doing during the past year.

What have you done? No one knows but you. Tell of your past work in the M.P. STUDIO, which is on the desk of every director, agent, studio manager and casting director.

50 per cent. Further, there are obvious economic advantages to be reaped, for the film is assured of a good reception in every country which is represented by an artiste in the picture.

What really is the position at International Artists? I've spent hours trying to get an actual statement from the firm, and this is Donald Crisp's own explanation:—"I am to make a 'Donald Crisp Production' which will be handled by this firm. I am going to have nothing to do with 'Lark's Gate'—that film has been put on the shelf for good. I am reconstructing nothing, but will work on a new basis and a new story. I shall have full and complete control of productions." So now we know—what?

PLOT CONSTRUCTION

by F. RUPERT CREW

IN setting out to write an original screen story, the scenario writer nearly always loses sight of his plot. If not, he places it second in his estimation of importance to the construction of his continuity. He is apt to forget that directors to-day look first and foremost for the plot, and that the construction of the scenario itself is of a secondary importance. It is not a difficult matter to strengthen a weak continuity; but it needs a bit of doing to strengthen a weak plot. If it is weak, it's weak, and there's an end of it—no matter how fine the scenario, ten chances to one it won't sell, and even if it does, the production is almost bound to be a failure.

During the last eighteen months, I suppose some half-dozen original scenarios have been filmed. Personally, I have seen at least five—and been frankly disappointed. The reason why directors still pin their faith to published novels and produced plays does not leave me wondering. If all films produced to-day possessed plots like some of the "originals" I've recently seen, then I fear British films could never compete with American. Why? Because the plots used were so utterly bad. To term them hackneyed would indeed be expressing their quality mildly.

It seems that the original scenario writer has not yet taken pains to study the fiction-writer's craft. The construction of his continuity seems to obsess him completely. In evolving his plots he clutches at the thinnest and most hackneyed themes, believing that he will get his effects by their "treatment" in the scenario. However, a few dramatic situations do not and cannot constitute a plot of literary merit. Plot-building is not merely a mechanical process. A good plot cannot be constructed upon a few "gags" or "situations." If a screen story is going to "grip" it must have some solid substance for its foundation. In a word, if the story is worth telling, it must possess a very definite motif. There must be one dominant idea behind the story; one which forces the story to begin and to end. The idea must be worth while, it should be of vital human interest, and one which is big enough to remain in the minds of the producer and his cast from the first scene to the last. Only in this way will the director and his interpreters have something, not to act, but to express.

All successful films have had big ideas behind them. Look at the theme used in the "Miracle Man" faith. Remember,

"Earthbound"—the question of life after death. As a British example, examine "The Fruitful Vine." The success and wonderful sincerity of this film was built upon the idea contained in the concluding sub-title—"Nearly All The Big Things Women Do Are For Men Who Don't Understand." That sub-title was in Maurice Elvey's mind from the moment he set about work on this adaptation, and through his genius he got it into the minds of his artistes. He gave them something to express. The result was a fine film. The players had something more to do than act—that's why.

If you would write a good story for the screen, you must write of things that matter. You must get hold of big, vital, burning themes, and construct your plots humanly. Whether they are comedies or dramas, make them always plausible. Fit in live characters—not mere dolls. And finally remember, that though the construction of a scenario may be a technical process, the writing of a story is an art—and not one wholly dependent upon one's knowledge of inside workings of the film studios.

IN DEFENCE

by SCENARIST,

In the article called "Nothing Doing," in the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO for April 29 there is this sentence: "Look at our present-day scenarists. What were they before they took up scenario writing? . . . Most of them were actors. . . . It is ridiculous to suppose they are capable of writing stories."

This argues such a woeful ignorance of screen matters, that one can only say that the writer of the article has been totally misled by whoever gave him the information. Our leading scenarists to-day are professional literary people. The late Bannister Merwin was a distinguished fiction writer and editor. Langford Reed was known as a brilliant journalist for years before he was connected with the kinema. Arthur Shirley and Alicia de Ramsey have world-wide reputations as dramatists, and Rafael Sabatini is a well-known novelist.

One could continue the list; but with regard to the suggestion that actors are incapable of writing dramatic plots, may I suggest that Shakespeare himself was an actor? I enclose my card.

F.-P. LASKY AD. TALK

Anyone can do advertising after a fashion. The trick is to do the sort of advertising that will bring the largest results for the least money. Don't pick on the first stunt that comes to your mind. Think up a lot, pick out the best, and store the others away against the coming of some day on which you can use it to advantage.

Prepare Your Advertising With the Greatest Care—And say it quick, using as much white space as possible.

Quality in Your Advertising—Is nearly as essential as quality on your screen.

Don't say advertising does not pay until you have tried it. If it doesn't, then you don't do enough.

Have something to say in your advertising! Don't just talk!

Advertise Like the Devil—He gets a lot of business.

SAVING THE SITUATION

Trade Propaganda Campaign to Attract Financial Support for the Industry

by
ERNEST G. ALLIGHAN.

A FEW months ago the inventor of cinematography died. He was an Englishman. The birthplace of cinematography is England. Fortunes have been made out of this British invention. And yet the British film producing industry is almost at death's door. These are the two facts, and form the greatest surprise of the financial world: that the wealth obtainable from a British invention should go out of the country of its origin.

The time has come for facing the facts of the situation coolly, and from the business point of view. And even the greatest optimist cannot avoid recognising that the British film producing industry is in danger either of dying out or of falling into the hands of foreign financiers. The times are serious, and the causes of the present adversity should be faced and removed.

In some respects British films fall below the standard of American films. But whatever the defects, and whatever the failure of the past, in the final analysis it is due to financial limitation. What is fundamentally wrong with the British producing is absence of money. In the past there has been no instance of adequate financial backing save one—an unfortunate case, but the gravity of which is unfairly distorted in view of the very considerable measure of success which has attended the four productions that the firm in question has Trade-shown, and of the others that are in course of production.

The logic of the case for British productions runs along this avenue: Kinematography is a British invention—the British producing industry is languishing for want of financial backing—British films are an excellent investment for the financier—financiers are prepared to invest in British films if the case for British films is presented to them in the right light. It is my intention in subsequent articles to prove to the financial world:

- (a) That the quality of British films does not compare so unfavourably as is imagined with that of American films.
- (b) The excellent returns that British films have yielded and are yielding.
- (c) That the American and Colonial markets are open to British films.
- (d) That the British exhibitor and public are anxious to see British films, and to pay extra for them.
- (e) That bad British films are due to lack of financial backing.
- (f) That this country is ideally suited for the production of films, and that we have facilities on a par with America.
- (g) That there is a possibility of German and American interests capturing the British producing industry, and so diverting British dividends outside this country.

In support of my contention that financiers are available if the case for British films is adequately presented, I will quote the remarks of "Jimmy" White at the Twenty Club recently. Mr. White had been "spoken at" by various Trade orators who had thrown out pointed hints as to the necessity for a millionaire to interest himself in the film industry, and Mr. White's speech had reference to this subject. He said:—

"British films are short of money because British film-producers are too modest. You have the biggest public in England, but you do not take them into your confidence. Tell your patrons that you need money for British films; use the wonderful propaganda instrument at your command, and you will get all the capital you desire. There is no more patriotic body of men than British financiers, but you must first show them that you intend to make British films a stable industry."

In the course of subsequent articles, and with the assistance of any in the Trade who can supply me with facts and figures, I intend to show the financiers of the country that British films can be a stable industry and an excellent financial investment. I will show the percentage returns on British films, and prove that the dividends on investments are comparable with investments in any typical commercial proposition. These articles are being specially circulated among members of the Stock Exchange, leading financiers, and the financial Press: in fact the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO commences a propaganda campaign on behalf of the British producing industry. Our intention is to form a Propaganda Committee of the leading business men in the industry in order to present the case to the financial world, and to invite a competent authority to appoint a Commission to investigate the British film producing industry, and to discover its capacities and resources as a financial investment.

I desire to make it perfectly clear that to save the industry every one who desires its salvation must co-operate in this Campaign. Heads of film-producing concerns are asked to supply—in strict and inviolable confidence—facts and figures that can help in the Campaign. Anyone who has any information that throws new light on the financial basis of the industry is invited to communicate with the writer. It must be remembered that this is a matter of life or death for the whole industry, and the good of the whole is greater than the good of the part; if the industry is saved individuals also are secure.

EVERYDAY and in every way the social events at the club are getting better. With each succeeding week the dances are better attended and "Our Own" band gives increasing pleasure. Already applications have been made for the band's services at outside functions. At last Saturday's dance there was a record attendance and a pleasant diversion was caused when Billie Bristow and Rex Davis were made the recipients of presentations in grateful recognition of their arduous labours in connection with the recent highly successful Carnival. They deserve all the thanks they get!

Personally I spent a very enjoyable evening in the billiard room on Sunday night, when the "Mum's-the-Word" billiard tournament was fought to a silent finish. Alec Alexander, junr., was kind enough to donate as prizes a purse, a leather pocket wallet, a patent pencil holder, and an ivory cigarette holder in case. Jack Gordon, the caterer, gave two free lunches as consolation prizes (and a very nice form of consolation, too!). Amid the enticements and excitements to speech by the onlookers, the contestants fought in silence. I asked Alec Hunter what'd he have and tears rolled down his cheek as he puzzled out the deaf-and-dumb words for "A double!" And one poor fellow (mercifully unnamed) breathed the pious wish that his dear wife would always play mum-billiards!

After an exciting tussle the prizes went to Irene Ridgwell, Alec Hunter, Mary McIntosh, and Eric Albury. Harry Worth was an excellent timekeeper, and Tony Fraser, an ideal referee.

Malcolm Tod tells me that his swimming committee is going strong. They have held some very enjoyable affairs at London baths, and there is every reason to believe that the swimming section will become one of the most popular features of the club life.

THE KINEMA CLUB KINE-KOPATERS

The Club jazz band really and truly originated in Algiers, when the present pianist, Victor A. Peers, and the trap-drummer, Cyril Percival, were over there in December, 1920, with Rene Plaissetty for the filming of "Four Feathers," and "The Broken Road." As the company arrived at the Hotel St. George, Algiers, before the season really commenced, the orchestra at the Hotel had not arrived, and as the Hotel was full and the evenings rather empty, Victor Peers and Cyril Percival formed a small dance band—consisting then of piano and drums—ran their own dances and social evenings for the company and the many English and American visitors to the Hotel under the patronage of the British Consul.

The experiment met with great success, and during their stay in Algiers and Biskra the "Stoll Jazz Band," as it was then called, was in very great demand.

When the Club opened, the idea of forming a dance band from members was discussed and one or two members (especially Harry Worth) who were out in Algiers with the "Four Feathers" Co., remembered the efforts of Peers and Percival, and these two were pressed into service towards forming the present club jazz band, ably assisted by those musical enthusiasts, Jack Raymond and Malcolm Tod. Anyway, Harry Worth brought these four together with the result that the "Kinema Klub Kine-kopaters" came into being on Good Friday night, after four rehearsals with a repertoire of sixteen numbers, all memorised—not a bad effort in the time!

At the moment their repertoire is about twenty-two numbers, I believe, and they are adding as rapidly as possible.

Regarding the personnel of the band, I must say a word in praise of our extremely efficient and able pianist, Victor Peers, a natural musician who plays any type of music with equal success, has a wonderful memory, a good ear for harmony, and can transpose into any key at will, to suit all instruments and occasions—in reality the brains of the band.

Jack Raymond, our cheery banjoline player, is also a "perfect marvel" at picking up harmony and committing same to memory, as all who have heard him must have realised.

Malcolm Tod is our enthusiastic "Swanee Whistler" and comedy conductor at times, and it is rumoured that Malcolm is studying hard on another instrument at the moment.

The trap-drummer is Cyril Percival, who has played all through his band career with Vic Peers, and while in Algiers these two were invited on more than one occasion to augment a well-known orchestra there. C.P. always says he has the softest job in the band, but the most to pack up.

Last Saturday night an additional member made his début in the person of Frank Canhan, with his Zither-banjo. Frank did remarkably well as he had only been able to get in one short rehearsal and had not played for some time.

Not the least pleasing items are the vocal numbers rendered during the dancing.

It is interesting to note how representative the band now is comprising as it does:—

LIGHTING FOR STUDIOS

by COLIN N. BENNETT, F.R.S., F.R.P.S.

Technical Expert to the Kine, Weekly.

We have often discussed studio lamps from the point of view of the light they give, but the mechanical arrangement by which this light is made use of is just as important in its own way. Upon it depends the accuracy with which light can be concentrated where we need it. Though present studio lighting systems are a good deal better than those early ones wherein the lamps were hung in regular rows underneath the studio roof, no one will seriously claim we are even yet very far advanced in the technique of managing our artificial light sources.

Cameramen generally, in these days, get enough, or nearly enough, light on their sets, but it is sometimes much too harsh, and, again, not infrequently far too flat. Multiple shadow outlines are commonly seen in studio-made "exteriors" and as for simulating the correct direction of cast shadows in lamp-lit and candle-lit sets, it is too difficult to be attempted.

Difficult as all of us know the handling of visible light sources to be, there seems to be a generally accepted convention among producers and cameramen to give this up at the start as a bad job. All of which suggests openings for improvement in the mechanical side of lamp construction and arrangement.

Meanwhile, for such effects as we do aim at, what is our regular stock in trade? For shadow lighting, mercury vapour lamps are the regular stand-by. A single bank frame of mercury vapour lamps contains eight tubes, each tube about four feet long, and giving about one thousand candle power in visual light rating. The tubes are arranged in a row, spaced at approximately six inches apart from tube to tube, so that the effective area of lighting source for each "bank" is four feet square, or sixteen square feet.

A double bank frame is a ground stand in which the lower bank is for ground and side lighting while the upper bank can be tilted to give an oblique overhead light. Were flat lighting good enough for our studio sets mercury vapour lamps would give us everything we want. The light is almost completely actinic. Hence it is the photographically most efficient lighting of all. For mid-shots and close ups, where faithful rendering of features and expressions of face can best be got with a round lighting devoid of definite sharp high-lights, mercury vapour lamps come out "strong."

Next to the vapour lamp, as a diffused light source must be put the flame arc, or the enclosed long arc, when well screened with suitable diffusing glass or material. Here we have a range of different lamps to choose from. Of flame arcs, Wohls, Kleigls, Kerners and Bardons are well known. They all have their strong points and their drawbacks. Mechanically, the American made lamps tend to be on the flimsy side. Still, the way they are made up as adjustable side lighting units on easily shiftable floor stands is very convenient. The lamps cannot be raised to a very high level, but the same makers supply top-lighting lamps to be slung, either singly or in clusters, from the studio roof.

That raises the question of the best way of slinging them. A fashion of past days was to arrange them as travelling cranes are arranged in factories, by making the upper carriage of the lamp run on an aerial rail. This aerial rail formed part of the structure of a wide trolley which itself travelled on separate aerial rails running the length of the studio. So each top-lighting lamp was provided with a universal travel, and could be shifted about to different parts of the studio without the necessity of unshipping and reslinging it.

Though it was, up to a point, a mechanical refinement, it had the weakness that when many lamps were so slung, their upper carriages often got in each other's way. In practice it is found that with the help of a ladder and one or two electrician mechanics you can get top-lighting lamps slung just as quickly, or more quickly. And again, where old-fashioned practice was to spread out top light, the modern way is to clump it in aggregations of four to eight lamps under a single wide reflector, forming an artificial "sun."

Bardon lamps, a product of France, are made up into two and four lamp side-lighting floor frames. They are open flame arcs, generally used with front diffusers of ground, or woven, glass. Their chief drawback is that the amount of photographic light they give does not justify the weight of the lighting unit. Like American flame arc lamps, visual light from "Bardons" is very high in proportion to useful photographic light.

When we come to British enclosed long arcs, of which the best known are Westminster lamps and G.E.C. studio arcs, the proportion of photographic light to visual light is again high, being only second to that from mercury vapour tubes. For some reason or other, it is not present practice to use woven glass diffusing screens with either of these lamps though they should be of great service. By fitting behind the globe of a Westminster lamp a "Barkay" reflector (a concave silvered glass reflector, the surface of which is not smooth, but pitted all over) the effective source of light is increased from about three inches by one quarter of an inch to an indefinite area some four or six inches square, with consequent shadow softening.

Another device for shadow softening is to use globes having their front half frosted by sand-blasting. Actinic arcs are doubly valuable in motion picture production in that the high amount of ultra-violet light given off by them makes the diffused light a very efficient shadow softener indeed. For ultra-violet light has a way of penetrating "dark" corners not possessed by visual light of any colour. This accounts for the relative softness in shadows when working with this lamp. Also it supplies a reason why cameramen accustomed only to flame arcs generally find the first negatives they make with actinic arcs are flat.

There remain three types of lamps with which the production of highlights is the paramount object. They are spotlights, studio searchlights, and quartzlights. Spotlights are moderate to high amperage open-type arcs, or white flame arcs, built as centring units in stage lime boxes with comparatively large diameter condensers. Small spotlights are often mounted above the back cloth, or back flats, of a set to throw a high oblique back lighting upon the heads and shoulders of leading actors. The effect is generally striking and nearly always totally unnatural.

The studio searchlight is an immense arc burning impregnated carbons and having a reflector two feet six to three feet in diameter. It is used either with a woven glass diffuser to flood the set, or, at a distance, without the diffuser to give an effect of strong sunlight, and in this last it is much more successful than the back spotlight, providing a sufficient number of auxiliary softening lamps are also brought to bear upon the scene. Quartzlight is a miniature mercury vapour lamp of high intrinsic and actinic brilliancy used mostly for simulating candle and lamp-light. If well shaded it is capable of providing a semi-visible diffused light source in a picture. It is very portable.

With all the array of lamps, how are we to use them? Where no two people think alike how shall anyone decide? Probably it is a mistake to mix up open and actinic arcs promiscuously on sets, as is now so commonly done. Back spots, furthermore, are thoroughly inartistic, and when a line of four or six of them is brought to bear on a studio-made exterior set the resulting effect of a heaven with six suns shining in it, all in different directions, is simply cruel. Yet we see that sort of thing, and a great deal of dead flat lighting also.

A workmanlike way of deciding the correct lighting scheme for any set, where working conditions allow, which unfortunately they often do not, is to strike up one lamp, or one lighting unit, only at first, and to shift the position of this single light source until (apart from questions of sufficient brightness) the whole set gets the nearest approach to the desired effect of light and shade, and relief. Having arrived at this, introduce the other lamps, unit by unit, always keeping in mind the chiaroscuro already found to be pleasing and satisfactory, till the foot-candle power illumination of the set is up to its full required strength. The hint is simple, but of some small value. Moreover, by trying it over a few times some cameramen are rewarded with a permanent improvement in their knowledge of correct lighting disposition.

DUTCH FILMS.

Holland as a producing centre has not been largely exploited, says Elsie Cohen, but there is one important concern, the Hollandia Film Company, with studios in quaint, old world Haarlem, "the town of tulips." This company has been in existence for some ten years, under the managing directorship of Maurice H. Binger, and is to-day an international producing unit of considerable repute. The Hollandia plant is the only film studio in the Netherlands, although several new and ambitious schemes are on the tapis. Hollandia is sending six of its productions to America, including The Skin Game; In the Night; The Black Tulip; Laughter and Tears; Joy and Circus Jim. Holland has many natural scenic advantages for film production and exceptionally good light, caused by the reflective value of the water from the canals, which wind endlessly through town and country, connecting links to everywhere. Again, the typical old-world villages, such as Marken, Volendam, etc., where the peasants still wear the original Dutch costume, and the brightly painted little houses form a background which has attracted artistes from all over the globe and which should be ideal material for the more modern part of cinematography.—International Cinema Trade Review.

COMPETITION.

According to Wids. (U.S.A.), American pictures are unable to compete with the German in Scandinavia. Swedish exhibitors, he says, are able to obtain a German production for less than half the price of a similar American release, due to the rate of exchange. He states the German picture is also more to the liking of the Scandinavians, for the stories are more serious and the public enjoys a morbid production. While "Broken Blossoms" made a record in Sweden, "Way Down East" only played two weeks, according to Le Mat. a good many of the failures may be accounted for by the lack of advertising and exploitation on the part of the exhibitor. Lobby displays, posters, stills and other methods of "putting it over" are foreign to the average Swedish exhibitor. American methods are only now being introduced in the larger cities.

FILM MORALS.

Don't go to see the films of persons you don't respect, says Elinor Glyn. Personally, I think the directors are to blame for employing people who have so little background and good taste that they lose their heads when they unexpectedly find themselves rich. But among all the stars with whom I worked and whom I saw in their homes only one or two were dope fiends. The great majority were honest, hard-working people with great temptations. Often I thought their manners were too familiar. But I often think that in New York, too. The moving picture industry is only about ten years old. Naturally a lot of riff-raff gathered about it at first. It requires young and beautiful girls. The result is a rather precarious situation. Chaperones certainly would not do any good. The only hope for a girl, in Hollywood or anywhere else, is her self-respect and her pride in her work. It is not true that a girl has got to go to fast parties and act "flip" to get on in the movie business. I believe real ability is immediately recognised there, as it is everywhere. I wish some of the old wives and spinsters who do the censoring could have to go through the lovemaking with eight different men a year that these girls do. Would they be proof? Don't you believe it.—New York World.

Record of Activities of Kine-Cameramen

AN INFLATED SELF-ESTIMATE.

PERHAPS, in the whole of the profession, there is no one, on the average, with a greater personal conceit than the cameraman. True, artistes and directors are popularly supposed to have an inflated idea of their own importance, but only a very small percentage is really so. In the ranks of the cameramen this percentage is large and the exceptions are very few.

We find the cameraman crying for recognition, but very often when the director gives him this recognition the cameraman begins to think himself invaluable and to abuse the power which the director bestows upon him.

Notice many cameramen on the floor; the director allows them time to test the lights, while he hangs around waiting until they are quite ready. Some cameramen, given this opportunity, take a delight in keeping their director waiting, and, naturally, before very long the director refuses to be kept waiting and instead of taking when the cameraman is ready the director takes when he himself is ready.

There are many such instances of cameramen defeating their own ends, purely and simply through overestimating their value. The cameraman is an important person in the studio and his work is beginning to receive the credit due, but when a cameraman wishes to dictate to his director, naturally the director does not appreciate it. No useful purpose is served by these methods. Too often we find that the cameraman refuses to be taught anything, simply because he is of the opinion that he knows everything there is to know. It is the man who is willing to learn that succeeds—he is the man who usually takes the best pictures; the other man, believing that he is beyond improvement, that he knows all, never advances, and with the rapid strides cinematography is making, he soon finds himself out of date and quite useless.

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

MUCH time was taken up at the last meeting in making attacks on the Kinema Club, and the way it was being run. It was suggested that the cameramen should try to find accommodation at the club, for the society, but one member protested and said that he thought the society would be better if it left the Kinema Club alone until such time as it was run on a more business-like basis.

It was mentioned that members of the Kinema Club treated cameramen as if they were far beneath their notice. Some of the K.C.S. members, also members of the Kinema Club, protested against this assertion, and pointed out that the cameramen were being treated in as nice a manner as anyone could wish for.

The dinner, according to Kenneth Gordon's report, was a huge success, for although altogether the Society lost about £2 over it, the publicity gained, was more than worth the money. Many cameramen had applied for membership since the night of the dinner, so that the money spent had not been spent in vain.

The Society's funds now amount to about £60, and nearly £200 is owing in subscriptions. Most of this money will probably be paid up before long and the Society will then be in affluent circumstances.

KINE-COLOUR

THE Lord Mayor of Bristol, the Lady Mayoress, a large number of city councillors and prominent citizens visited the Picture House, Clare Street, Bristol, the other day to witness a demonstration of a new colour process, by R. Humphrey and Co., Freese Greene. It was claimed that this new colour process, when applied to cinematography films, would be a distinct step forward and would revolutionise the whole industry.

Some interesting scenics were shown, including a trip across England by aeroplane, with some beautiful colour effects. A wide range of subjects were shown including old-fashioned and highly-coloured costumes, close-ups of faces with delicate flesh tints, colours dropped into a bowl of water and many other subjects.

At the end of the demonstration the Lord Mayor expressed himself satisfied with the show that had been given. He thought that the films were excellent and pointed out that he had once upon a time had some experience with photography, so that he was not judging the films purely from the point of view of a novice.

The inventors do not claim that they have reached perfection yet, but it is said of their work that they have carried possibility a stage further than any other system. One of their limitations is that chemical research has not as yet resulted in the discovery of agencies required to achieve certain colour changes on the photographic film, whilst autochrome colour photography is, of course, still too slow for cinematography work.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

JACK COX is now in Switzerland, where he has been filming for Maurice Elvey the few remaining scenes of "Running Water." Cox will doubtless be the cameraman who will film "Dick Turpin's Ride to York" for Stoll.

The exclusive rights of filming in the London Zoo have long been vested in the Zoo's own cameraman. The Pathé Gazette recently succeeded in destroying this exclusive right by publishing photos taken in the Zoo in one of its recent issues. This was done by sending a cameraman along to the Zoo with a Sept camera, which is, of course, a small affair that can easily be carried in the cameraman's pocket. By using this camera some unique photos of the interior of the Zoo were obtained.

Frank Bussell was over at Genoa filming the conference for Pathé. He is a very suitable man for the job, being able to speak quite a number of different languages fluently. On a job such as the Conference, where so many different languages are spoken, he finds his talent useful.

A patent has just been taken out on a new apparatus for obtaining relief effect in films. The apparatus is described as follows: A cinematograph camera is moved in a curved path in a plane transverse to the principal axis of the camera lens while photographs are being taken so as to produce a film having relief effect. An apparatus has been arranged by which the camera is moved continuously in a circle and the lens is constantly directed to a fixed point in the subject photographed.

George Woods-Taylor was welcomed back to the K.C.S. last Wednesday night, when he turned up to see how things were going on. He looks the better for his Indian trip, but confesses that he now requires a holiday. For this reason he intends leaving Gordon with the secretaryship for a time.

Phil Hatkin is working for Harold Shaw on "Love and the Whirlwind" at the Alliance. He has some clever lighting effects in the films which should be appreciated when the picture is Trade shown. I was down at the St. Margaret's studio last week and was struck by the co-operation between cameraman and director. Harold Shaw gives Hatkin every assistance in getting the photographic effects, and the two consult each other on many matters of the production.

The Weakness of Anomalies.

DURING the past few days the British Board of Film Censors has been busy at the expense of a British production—"Cocaine"—and has decided to ban it. The effect of this ban is to preclude it being shown in any Kinema within the L.C.C. area and in any other area where the local body upholds the Board's decision. Ever since the first film was ever shown this subject of censorship has been a very thorny problem. In the past the British industry has persuaded itself that the British method of film censorship was the best possible, but in our candid moments we have to admit that it has its weaknesses, and these are mainly attributable to its anomalies. It must not be forgotten, however, that a form of censorship that is capable of pleasing everyone is impossible of invention.

Methods of Censorship.

THERE are four possible methods to adopt: To have no censorship at all; to have the present Trade censorship; to have local censorship; to have State censorship. State censorship is abhorrent. We entirely oppose it—on principle and because of the evils that are unavoidable. State censorship would inevitably mean political colouring; all State Departments being in charge of a politician of the colour of the particular Government in power, it would be natural for films passed by the State Censor of a Labour Government to have a slight or pronounced Labour bias, those passed under a Conservative Government a Tory bias, those under a Coalition Government a Coalition bias. And once the politician gets hold of anything—Heaven help the Anything!

The best Method.

LOCAL censorship would be as bad. It could place in the hands of the stalwarts of the parish pump the power to decree the type of film entertainment for the rest of the village. And as opinions are as varied as mangoldwurzels, the situation would arise of the inhabitants of Gubbermuck, being denied a film that the inhabitants of Slummercluck a mile distant were allowed to enjoy. As for the present Trade censorship, it is the best form yet discovered. The Board of Censors is the paid servant of the Trade. Its existence depends on the Trade. Its decisions are influenced by interests of the Trade. We can think of no better system of censorship than this.

Remove the Necessity.

APART from this Trade censorship there is one alternative; no censorship. And that is not so unattainable as is popularly supposed. Censorship is dependent, not upon the people who see films but on those who make them. The evils of censorship can be removed when the necessity for censorship is removed. What is needed is a unanimous intention and practice, on the part of film producing concerns and film directors.

Q There is a danger in smug self-complacency that causes one to believe things are better than they are.

Fight this by regarding your best work as your worst and then set out to improve on it. Regard ff as pp and crescendo up.

Q It is no use getting your head well in the sand. Look the facts in the face and seek to improve them.

to make clean, wholesome uncensorable films. The only way to ensure that films are not banned is to make them after such a fashion that they do not contravene the accepted standards of decency and expediency. This is where the onus is thrown on the British producing industry; let no films be issued from our studios that are not capable of passing the censorious eye of a discerning and exacting public.

* * *

"Six to one and . . ."

ON the subject of this particular film—"Cocaine"—we have only two remarks to make. In the first place we are surprised that Astra could have been so unwise as to Trade show and accept bookings on a film before it had been submitted to the British Board of Film Censors. Our surprise is greater in view of the fact that Astra well knows that exhibitors are precluded by their Association from showing films that have not been passed by the Board. This was bad business on Astra's part, unless it expected to gain by the publicity the banning affords. Our other comment concerns the Censor. Mr. O'Connor, over the telephone, told us, that he banned "Cocaine" because it would excite general curiosity in a form of vice that was practically confined to a small minority of the community. We consider that in so doing the Board steps from censorship to criticism; it trespasses outside the frontiers of its rightful function. It is not for the Board, individually or collectively, to hold an opinion on the prevalence or otherwise of a vice or of the effect on that vice of a film. If the film possessed no incident that offended public morality the Board has exceeded its powers in banning "Cocaine."

* * *

Youthful Indiscretion.

WE are surprised that Lord Northcliffe, with his genius for prevision, has never yet placed a correct value on motion pictures. He evidently regards the Kinema in the same light as he regards bowls or croquet—the interest of a few fogies—when all the time it reaches and interests far more people than all his publications put together. What we have particularly in mind now is the haphazard, inefficient way in which film matters are dealt with in the Daily Mail. Since Arthur Weigall's pen was lost to the Mail the Film Notes have been amusing piffle, reflecting abysmal ignorance of film matters on the part of the "Film Critic" who writes them. Only a few days back this youth wrote the following: "As evidence of the more serious way in which people are beginning to regard the Kinema it may be worth mentioning that an Amateur Film Production Academy has been formed." We italicise the amusing piffle that this juvenile scribe considers of importance. If only he knew more about the film business the italics would not be necessary. This particular "Production Academy" has consequently used the Mail's gratuitous advertisement to boost itself in other papers and in order to induce the susceptible to part with their five guineas in return for film tuition.

Intimate Studio Gossip

In two weeks time the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO celebrates its first birthday. Messages of congratulation are already beginning to dribble in, and I can promise you that the June 3 issue—the Anniversary Double Number—will be a bumper. Arrangements have been made for an extended circulation to embrace all British and American studios as well as Continental studios. Special advertising features will be included—it is going to be a Propaganda Edition. Get in touch with us at once and let us know what space you require.

Challis Sanderson, who has just completed five one-reelers for Masters, tells me that during the weeks he was working down at Teddington, he found the Club invaluable for casting purposes. Most of his leads were engaged at the Club, and during the whole time not one person approached him on the Club premises for work. Having completed his contract with Masters, Sanderson is open for offers of further production work, but in the meantime he has turned his attention to the cutting and editing of a number of films, a job at which he is particularly expert.

At the Harley Knoles luncheon (reported on page 10) Harry Reichenbach, the American publicity expert, informed the company that while he was over here a week or so ago D. W. Griffith was offered £200,000 for the purpose of filming H. G. Wells' book, "Outline of History." He also asserted that D. W. G. can get all the money he wants in America. Then, why on earth did he come over here and raise the wind?

I am asked to contradict the rumour that Irene Tripod has given up film work. I do so gladly. What would British studio life be without 'Rene?

"Walter Wants Work" sounds like something to do with the film business! As a matter of fact it is the title allotted to Walter Forde's latest comedy, which is now in course of production. Strictly speaking, Walter doesn't want work; in fact, he has enough work to last him for quite a long time to come. This film is the last of a series of six, which he was to make for Zodiac, but these six are only a foretaste of what has yet to come. To begin with, Forde will make a three-reeler; this is to be followed by a series of six two-reelers and then a five-reeler on top of all. All these pictures are to be handled by Zodiac. Pauline Peters, I see, is again playing opposite Forde, this time in "Walter Wants Work."

The comparatively quiet village of Isleworth was startled into activity the other night when Fred Paul and an invading force of artistes sallied forth from the British Super Films Studios to celebrate the relief of Mafeking. Rather late in the day to celebrate such an event, you may think, but it had to be done, for the script of "The Faithful Heart" demanded the inclusion of such a scene. Four hundred people, I am told, participated in the revelry, eight sunlight arcs lit up the night, hundreds of rockets, fireworks and other Mafeking and Armistice Day paraphernalia created the atmosphere.

My reason for attending the Trade show of "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" last week was to see how the Italians produced this film, for the exteriors of which, it will be recollected, a company of Italian artistes visited London last year. This picture is of particular interest to the profession, because it marks the beginning of a new policy on the part of the Italian Company which made the film. Sig. Amato, director of the V.C.I. Renascimento Studios, the company in question, believes that the Englishman is the representative of the Anglo-Saxon race and the Italian the representative of the Latin races. His theory is that by combining the work of English authors, Italian directors, using both the scenery of England and Italy and a mixed cast of English and Italian artistes, it should be possible to get an International picture.

It is with the object of putting this theory into practice that Amato has been visiting England. Already he has booked Milton Rosmer to play opposite Pina Menichelli in a screen version of "Man and Woman," by Robert Buchanan, and a company of artistes arrive from Italy in a few weeks time to film the exteriors in Limehouse. The next picture on the company's program is one of Rider Haggard's books. For this, a number of English artistes are to be engaged. Personally, I regard this move as an interesting one, and one which, if Sig. Amato receives the support and co-operation which he hopes for, will develop into something big.

Fred Leroy Granville tells me that he has started casting for the first of his Granville Productions which will be released through the British International Film Corporation. This picture, "The Price of Silence," will be the first on the British International scheme, and Granville is going to make the interiors in England and the exteriors in the Sahara desert. He is planning a series of six productions, which is to be his annual output, and I understand that they are assured a good reception in U.S.A. by virtue of Granville's name.

A DANIEL TO JUDGMENT

by "Fair Play."

ARE you not a bit unreasonable in your wholesale slating of Training Schools for Kinema work? I hold no brief for or against schools, but a one-sided statement needs "the other side."

As a rule, people who pay for lessons can afford to do so (there are always exceptions, e.g., the poor little servant girl who spends her all, etc.), but, often, reduction in circumstances, and the idea of "easy" work, will cause these same people, especially if they have any knowledge of amateur acting, to try a course of lessons.

At the worst, pure vanity may be a motive; or, an idiot or so may wish to throw away money, in which case, so be it! The School in the latter case is scarcely to be blamed.—All are not dancers who have paid fees to learn dancing!

A school with a decent, straightforward direction, and competent teachers, can scarcely be responsible for those pupils, who, not being successful, gain pity from directors by sad tales of broken promises!

There have been dramatic schools, and good actors have come from them; just, as to-day there are in London, actively working in the studios in one capacity or another, hundreds who could testify to the training and benefit they have obtained from one kinema school (I feel convinced that, if needed, these artistes would be honourable enough to supply a list of their names to you).

As a rule, directors are absolutely fair in judgment, and as it is up to them to select (and give a "trial test"), it is easy enough for them to turn any applicant down; there is no need to be virulent against all schools.

As to these pupils "over-crowding the market," do you not think that the theatrical successes, who work the Picture Studios in conjunction with the "legitimate," help, just a little, in the over-crowding? Sorry to have taken so much of your time, but while you are doing good in "exposing flagrant swindles," do not condemn all Training Schools.

PROVIDED the story told by W. Bayard Hale concerning the demonstration which took place in the darkened garden at the Experimental Laboratory, Brevik, about ten miles from Stockholm, with a loud speaking telephone synchronised to pictures, proves to be supported by further demonstrations then we are confronted by a great advance in the art of moving picture play production. Hitherto we have had to be content with seeing the artistes on the screen; in the future it is said we shall hear them speak. According to the report the film-photophone operator sets up in the neighbourhood of its actors a double camera. Its two reels revolve on a common shaft. The record of one camera is the ordinary cinematograph. The eye of the second camera is not, says Hale, directed towards the actor, but gazes into a ray of light—a ray agitated by the actor's voice. How is the ray agitated? Across the end of a little horn, like a telephone receiver (which, in fact, it is), stretches a delicate diaphragm of rock crystal. Upon the silvery back of this diaphragm falls a slender shaft of light from an electric bulb. The shaft of light

FILM PHOTOPHONE

A New Swedish Invention.

impinges on the diaphragm at an angle. This is reflected into the camera, which it enters through a narrow upright slit. So long as the reflector is at rest the ray of light will be reflected at a single constant angle, corresponding to the angle of its incidence. But if the reflector be agitated the ray will be reflected at constantly changing angles. Were the diaphragm at rest the reflected ray would photograph itself as a straight band of white along the bottom of the moving film. But as the reflector vibrates the straight band becomes a silhouette of waves of varied contour. This is the photograph of the spoken words. But how reconvert, at will, this phono-photograph into sound? How retransmogrify these pictured vibrations into resonant vibrations? There is a substance, an element, known as selenium, which possesses the curious property of resisting the passage of electricity in proportion to the degree of light in which it is bathed. The photophone invokes the aid of this mineral. In an amalgam with other substances, which render possible practical utilisation of its curious property, selenium is made the controlling feature of a device, in the nature of a light-electric cell, which augments or diminishes its own resistance to an electric current in accurate response to the strength of the light that falls upon it. It is upon this selenium cell, not upon a screen, that the film of the voice is projected. The electric current emerges from the selenium cell, in precise correspondence with the vibration of the light waves, and with the sound waves of which they are the reproduction.

MAKE-UP OR TYPES?

by Sydney Paxton.

In these days, when actors are so much engaged as types, which I deplore, make-up has lost much of its importance. For instance, in the play in which I am at present appearing there are no make-ups at all.

Nevertheless, I believe in make-ups, and I am not one of those who wish to see Willie Clarkson's occupation gone. I think it tiresome immediately to recognise an actor directly he appears on the stage. I would rather look at the artistes and then at the program and say, "Why, that's so-and-so, what a splendid make-up!"

However, most of our present-day stage producers (and film directors—Ed.) think differently. Blotchy-faced are engaged for blotchy-faced parts, hollow-cheeked men for cadaverous parts, and so on. No doubt it is all very natural and artistic, but it is strange that some producers so seldom seem to realise that it is possible to be natural and yet "made up."

In my young days, of course, one didn't feel really an actor unless made up and wearing a wig. The following story, told by Sir Arthur Pinero, was then typical of many managements.

"A young actor, whom I knew in later years, and from whom I heard the tale, was making his first appearance in a 'juvenile' part in a melodrama. He had finished dressing, and was sitting waiting for the call-boy to shout 'beginners,' when an old stager dressing at the same bench, after surveying him steadily, said: 'Laddie, where's your wig?' 'Wig?' inquired my friend. 'Yes,' returned the old man, 'you've forgotten your wig.' 'Oh,' said the novice, 'I'm not yearning a wig, you see I'm playing a young fellow of my own age. Might be myself, in fact. I don't need a wig.' 'Ah! h'm!' replied the old man, gravely, 'you're wrong, laddie; believe me you're wrong. They look for a wig at this theatre.'

It was, perhaps, occasionally ridiculous to see quite a young face topped by an old man's wig, marred by thick lake lines numerous enough to rival Clapham Junction Railway Station. This sort of thing can quickly turn a tragedy to a farce. There are types of faces that will at once make up, and some won't. I have never much appreciated the make-up which takes an hour to put on. Pencilling and shading may be very artistic but are rarely so effective as a few lines in the right places.

It is a real pleasure to feel one is well made up. A well-fitting wig, a characteristic beard or moustache gives one confidence that I think is lacking when an actor has to rely entirely on his natural personality, recognisable directly he appears.

I do not advise make-up for make-up's sake, but I do think that the engagement of "types," whether they can play the parts or not (very often they can't), is a pity. It is, to say the least, doubtful whether playgoers wish to see again and again the same old face of the same old actor in the similar old part.

Let me suggest that our producers should sometimes engage artistes who can make up.—(Actor.)

SAVING THE SITUATION

by ERNEST G. ALLIGHAN.

II.—Possibilities of the British Producing Field

THERE has grown a tradition that the home of motion photography is America, and that in no other part of the world—last and least of all, Great Britain—can films be made with such success. This tradition is born of ignorance of the actual facts: very few financiers are conversant with the international film position. If this position is defined, it may help the financier more correctly to appraise the worth of this country as a film producing centre.

During these post-war years, America has experienced a dual advantage over this country in the matter of film production. It has had the very tangible benefit of those years while this country had all its resources directed to waging war. British men, brains and money were concentrated on the war, and the British film producing industry was necessarily neglected.

But not so with America where, her chief competitor engaged in the war, she was able to concentrate men, brains and money on perfecting her motion picture business until, at the conclusion of the Armistice, the motion picture business was the third greatest industry of America. During those years, Americans were developing this industry, experimenting with new systems of lighting and new methods of studio organisation, training up beautiful actresses, talented actors and skilful film directors.

I am not blaming America for doing this: it was business—good business. Neither am I excusing any defect in British productions: this is not an apologia—it is an explanation.

The other huge advantage America has had is in the rate of exchange which has been, and still is, in her favour. We, on the other hand, have had the advantage over Germany, Italy and France in the matter of exchanges, but the German, Italian and French output of films has been quite as, if not more than, restricted as ours owing to the military endeavour of 1914-1918. There is, then, no strange coincidence in the fact that the country whence we buy most films and to which we export least, is the only country that has the advantage of us in exchange. The American dollar never stood at more than four to the pound sterling, and has been down as low as three and a half. This has caused a great deal of business to go away from London because it is impossible to buy at an adverse exchange and sell to countries where the pound sterling is against us.

This exchange problem has seriously affected British film output. In the past, a foreign buyer did not hesitate to make a contract in London and buy a British producing firm's output for twelve months, with the knowledge that on certain dates during this period he would have to make certain well-defined payments. But now he does not buy, because he knows that the chances are that the value of his money will depreciate after a few months by from anything to 40 per cent., and even, in the case of France, by 100 per cent. In this way he stands to lose more on the exchange than he can realise as profit.

Again, for some time, there has been a very unsettling agitation in America for a heavy import tax on British films. This has fallen through, but the effects of that agitation are still perceptible.

Parenthetically, I may be allowed to observe that the whole question of this suggested tax arose owing to the very considerable success that attended the introduction of two European films into America, and this agitation originated, not from the majority of responsible American film directors, but from a film artists' protection society which paid this country the subtle compliment of fearing the competition of British films made by British artistes.

During the past two years there has been a gradual drop in our exports of positive film, but in the main this is due to the adverse influence of the exchange. In 1920, we exported 15,749,817 feet, and during the first 10 months of 1921, we exported 10,720,797 feet. But the general figures show that London still maintains its position as the distributing centre for Europe: the weakness is with our producing industry.

As I stated earlier, the tradition that America is the seat of film power is not so firmly founded in fact as it is generally supposed. In this country there is a producing industry greater than any other country in Europe, with the possible exception of Germany, which is making rapid strides to overtake us.

There are 37 studios in this country; 63 experienced film directors and about 3,000 people engaged in the industry. During the past year, 152 five-reel features have been made in British studios, and the quality of many of these is of a high standard. There are films, such as "The Fruitful Vine," which are yielding as much as 400 per cent. That is to say, a film that may have cost £5,000 to produce is capable of booking (and has booked) as much as £20,000.

The rest of the European producing field is spread over Sweden, Germany, Italy, Holland, France and Spain. There are 39 French producing firms with only 26 film directors; the German producing industry is on the up-grade and its productions penetrating into the British and American markets, Spanish production has been very small and the possibilities of native production do not appear to have been adequately realised by the Spaniards, the general run of subjects being very much below modern standards—there are nine Spanish producing companies; the Swedish producing industry is on quite a good plane; there are thirteen producing concerns in Hungary.

In view of these bald statements, the financier can see that there is a sense in which America does not hold the position of glorious isolation in film production that is generally supposed. Nor, for that matter, should it be presumed that America has a unique position so far as natural advantages are concerned.

Actually, the fact that the Americans have been working frenziedly while Europe was fighting is as much its weakness as its strength; for the simple reason that America has been shot to death. Even the Americans are dead-tired of America on the screen. Confirmed picture-goers in America complain that in almost every picture they see the same white-pillared mansion with its sweeping drives and spacious terraces; or the same stretch of mountain; or the same sweep of prairie; or the same rail terminus.

And there is a widespread desire for fresh natural settings. So much so, in fact, that among the most popular films with American picture-goers are the scenic films showing the beauties of the British Isles. It was my duty to interview Maurice Tourneur, the famous American director, when he reached London a few days ago, and I questioned him on this very subject. His answer was unequivocal: "I consider that there is every reason to suppose that this country will become the centre of film producing activities. It is the terminus of all the roads that lead to all the best locations in the world. In thirty-six hours—less time than it takes to get from our New York studios to California—you can get desert scenes in Algiers, gambling sets in Monte Carlo, ice-fields in Northern Scandinavia, glacier mountains in Switzerland, and a wealth of wonderful natural scenery in Ireland and on the Continent, to say nothing of the historic places in England and Scotland. In addition to this, London is the hub of the British Empire and the centre for stories, plays and other literary material for films."

It should be explained to our financiers that every day in the week American directors are running their companies of artistes from New York studios to the West Coast or down to the South in order to secure scenes for motion pictures: the distance and the expense involved are far greater than to take the same company from London to Algiers, or to Nice, or to Africa, or to Switzerland. In decrying British climatic and atmospheric conditions, it must not be overlooked that England is the centre, of which the perfect film producing conditions of South Europe, the Near East, West Ireland and Sweden are the circumference.

We may not have the perpetual sunshine that California has, but Morocco is easier and cheaper to reach from London studios than is California from New York studios. Further, Tourneur himself told me that with the vast improvement in artificial lighting the absence of natural light is no handicap at all.

As for atmospheric conditions, these are not so adverse as is often suggested. Once outside the fog-belt that surrounds London, the conditions on the South Downs, in Devon, in Cornwall, and in Scotland are ideal for producing purposes. There is no reason why the Torquay district should not rival Los Angeles, for the actinic properties of the light there are perfect.

These are a few of the facts that, once brought to the notice of our financiers, should convince them of the possibilities of the British producing field. These possibilities cannot be exploited because of the lack of money. "Jimmy" White says, "You lack stars. You must find them. You have to create a number of public idols. When that happens—and your stars are known—it will have an immense influence upon the investing public." But he, of all men, should know that there is no lack of histrionic talent in this country. But it costs money. Stars can be found when the money is forthcoming.

CHARACTERISTICS OF ACTORS & DIRECTORS

by "SENEX"

IT has often been said that the camera cannot lie. It is difficult to accept this statement as strictly true in these days when the fakes the camera can bring about are common knowledge. Nevertheless, these words are still as true as ever in the sense that the real test of film acting is what is seen on the screen after being produced from life by the aid of the camera.

Film actors may be divided into two classes:

(1) The actor experienced in work on the legitimate stage.

(2) Everybody else.

Now it is certainly true that many actors who take part in the movies look down on the other class with no experience in stage work. To show the absurdity of their view you have only to see boys or girls in a film production who are performing some action which either they are accustomed to or are congenial to them, and I defy you to find any better so-called acting.

The reason for this is, of course, that they are not mimicking, they are performing the act in the true natural way. The young actor has generally at the back of his mind how someone would have acted the part, and often becomes a feeble imitator of a past genius.

It therefore comes about that, given ordinary intelligence, the man without stage experience is as good or better than the actor who has graduated in the 'Varsity of stage craft, and has to forget much of what perhaps has been a necessary part of his education for the stage.

In making a comparison between the production of a play on the stage and that placed on the screen by the aid of photography, it is well to bear in mind that, although the public regards the production from the same point of view in either case—viz., that of an onlooker's, it is not in the literal sense of the word an audience, and the artistes engaged in portraying a story or play for the screen are handicapped by the fact that without speaking their parts they are expected with the aid of a very few words thrown on the screen to convey the impression that they are actually performing their various parts exactly in the same manner as if they were speaking them.

It is thus obvious that the kinema artiste should be as well acquainted with the part he is playing as the actor who learns his words by heart. The omission to put the script in the hands of every artiste, and, in lieu thereof, to speak with (or without) the aid of a megaphone from a distance sufficient to get a general view of the whole scene, is in my humble opinion not the right way to get the best out of the artiste.

To put it succinctly, let the same opportunity be given to those who are playing small parts to study their work as is given to those who bear noble parts and scintillate as stars.

The time occupied in an action or speech or both combined is an essential to be studied, and if practised by the player from the actual words it will save the director some time in rehearsing. A typewritten script of his part, no matter how small, should be handed to every artiste, and for crowd work it would perhaps be sufficient for a few copies of the scene to be distributed in the dressing-room, a course which would give everyone an insight into and a useful intimacy with the work he is about to do, resulting in a better picture with less work for the director, a saving of time, and a consequent reduction in expense. The Romans have handed us down the axiom: "A poet is born, not made." However incontrovertible the truth of these words with regard to poets, they cannot justly be attributed to directors of motion pictures, who must not only be born, but also made if they are to attain the highest rank.

A really first-class director must not only have a natural aptitude for the film direction; he should be above the average in general education, be a good all-round sportsman, an artiste, and a great observer of man and Nature; he must acquire a good knowledge of photography; he must not be lacking in powers of concentration; he should be indefatigable. To these qualities should be added an even temper and an urbane manner, combined with infinite patience and extraordinary tact. Let us hope that many of these are the actual attributes of an Englishman, and no doubt the best may be acquired by the coming ideal British director.

HARLEY KNOLES' TRIUMPH

After the Trade show of "The Bohemian Girl," a Press luncheon was held at the R.A.C. Club, and there was a peculiar interest attaching to each of the speakers. Sir John Rees, M.P., for instance, is an old chairman of the London Film Company; Sir Charles Higham was the instigator of the Alliance; Harley Knoles is, of course, the "big noise" at St. Margarets; Sir Edward Marshall Hall is the eminent K.C.; and Sir Walter De Frece, M.P., is the chairman of the Alliance. There were also present Ellen Terry, Gladys Cooper, Constance Collier, Ivor Novello, Aubrey Smith, A. E. Newbould, M.P., and the representatives of the lay and Trade Press.

Sir Charles Higham, M.P., who stated that he is not now connected with Alliance, claimed that "Carnival" and "The Bohemian Girl" were far ahead of any British production, and that Harley Knoles had not only made the reputation of the Alliance but also of the British Industry—"it this company can make films like this the British Industry obtains a new and better appreciation in the financial world."

Sir Charles paid a great tribute to Knoles, and stated that "the artistry of Harley Knoles was the soul of the painter." He closed with an appeal for greater friendliness and co-operation with the American film Industry, and referred to U.S.A. as "the mother country of films."

Sir Walter De Frece, M.P., said that when he was first approached by Sir Charles Higham, M.P., with the Alliance project the capital suggested to him was £250,000, but he replied that it was of no use trying to compete with their opponents unless their financial position was stronger than the opponent's, and it was decided to raise the capital to a million pounds. He then referred to the Alliance disaster, and added: "In standing to our guns and producing several pictures, of which two stand out, we have justified every effort made and proved that this country can produce films equally good with those of other countries."

Sir Walter continued: "I am convinced that there is no advantage that America possesses that we cannot compete with. We are only lacking financial support. Within the last six months two firms which have produced good stuff have gone to the wall simply because it was impossible to interest the financiers. And I have a suspicion that America is feeling the pinch of finance. . . . Americans come over here and raise fresh capital for pictures with no trouble. . . . If Harley Knoles had had the financial backing that D. W. Griffith had he could have produced just as great a picture as Griffith."

Referring to the Alliance, Sir Walter said that none of the directors of the company had drawn a penny for their services, and then flung a challenge to the financiers: "If we could produce three such films as 'The Bohemian Girl' each year we could pay a dividend; but we have not the money so to do."

Harley Knoles claimed that the two greatest cameramen in the world were Rosher and his own—Rene Guessart. Referring to "The Bohemian Girl," he said that he went out to get the very best names for his cast, but not because they were names, but because they were artistic souls did he use the famous artistes that are in "The Bohemian Girl." He concluded with an appeal for a better understanding of and with America—"there is no spirit of carping with true Americans."

INGREDIENTS OF SUCCESS

EXHIBITORS are crying out for short subjects—really good comedies and one- or two-reel dramas. The supply of these films is not equal to the demand, so that it is not surprising to find many British producing companies are turning their attention to one-reel feature films. The one-reeler, in many people's opinion, represents an easy way of making money. A badly equipped studio, a tawdry set or two, a few artistes and a cheap cameraman. That is roughly the ingredients some people imagine necessary for the making of a one-reeler.

We must not lose sight of the fact that these one-reelers are being substituted for the big five-reeler which occupied the second position on the program. These five-reelers had a great deal of care lavished upon them in the making, their only fault being that two big five-reelers was tiring to many audiences. A one-reeler, which is to take the place of these technically efficient five-reelers, must be something more than an inexpensive, hurriedly directed and badly photographed film. Care must be taken in its production and the photography must be of a very excellent quality.

A good cameraman can considerably help in putting over these films. He can, to a certain extent, disguise the bad sets, he can create atmosphere, get pictorial composition into each scene; in fact improve the whole tone of the film a hundredfold, but he cannot be expected to work in a badly equipped studio. He must have enough lamps to light his set, money must therefore be spent on getting a good studio.

To get a good cameraman it is necessary to pay well. That is the reason why most of the one-reel subjects being turned out are so badly photographed.

The demand for short features is big, the opportunities for British directors are great, but we must bear in mind that short subjects are not necessarily cheap subjects, above all they are not to be spoiled by bad photography. The director who contemplates making short features should first secure a well-equipped-up studio and a cameraman whose work is known to be good. Then he has laid the foundations of a successful film.

K.C.S. OFFICIAL NEWS

THE failure of members to turn up in their scores has led to the alteration of the meeting night from Wednesday to Friday. Consequently, on Wednesday night there was no meeting, the meeting being held last night (Friday), when it was too late for us to publish what effect the return to the old meeting night had on the attendance at the meeting.

If we remember rightly, when the meeting night was altered from Friday to Wednesday, it was mentioned that it should only be for a trial, and unless Wednesday proved more suitable the night would be altered back to Friday. Wednesday night has been tried and found wanting. It now remains to see how the members will support the old meeting night of the Society.

Last night P. Dennis was to lecture on some panoramic views he had taken during the war of the German lines. He had promised to bring along some unique photos taken by him from the front line trenches.

A great deal of time is wasted at meetings by members getting up and giving elaborate accounts of something in which the other members are not in the least degree interested, or in propounding their theories in a long, uninteresting roundabout way. Every week we have instances of it. It seems a pity that some members cannot state their ideas and views in a more compact speech and save the other members from having to sit there listening to something in which they are not in the least interested.

CAMERAMAN'S
CHARMED LIFE

THERE is a Pathé Gazette cameraman who, it would appear, possesses a charmed life. At the time of the disaster to the British airship, the R38, this operator was prevented at the last minute from ascending in the ill-fated dirigible. And the same cameraman narrowly escaped death at Brooklands recently when, at the last moment, he did not go up in the Vickers machine piloted by the late Sir Ross Smith, that a few minutes later crashed to the ground.

The lucky operator secured the only pictures of the disaster to Sir Ross Smith that depicted the wrecked machine a few minutes after it had smashed itself into a mass of twisted spars and metal. The Pathé Gazette films of the fatal mishap are a complete record of the tragically short life of the giant aeroplane that was to have flown round the world with a Pathé camera on board. Pictures were secured of the machine in flight when it was first tested by Captain Cockerell, when it appeared to be flying with impressive speed and stability.

The films of the wrecked amphibian that follow on the pictures of its successful test flight form a grim contrast, and they very forcibly bring home to picture-theatre audiences the perils that still lurk behind flying.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

HAVE just received a postcard from D. P. Cooper, who is at present away in Switzerland with Jack Cox and the Maurice Elvey (Stoll) company, filming "Running Water." His brief message tells me little of what is happening there.

Arthur Kingston has turned from speaking pictures to the filming of comedies, and is now busy on a production by Albanian Films called "The Cause of All the Trouble." I am particularly interested in Kingston's "Kingstonised" Pathé, on which he has been promising to write me an article for weeks past. Still, everything comes to he who waits, and in all probability I will be able to give a description of the camera on this page at a later date.

The filming of "Rob Roy" promises to be an important event for Scotland, a more important event than it seems at first glance. This is about the first time on record that the Scottish climate has been given a proper chance, and providing it behaves itself, we may, at some future date, see the scenery of Scotland used more extensively by film companies. It is left to Arthur St. Brown, and, I take it, Bassill Emmott, to give Scotland a chance to shine as a filmable country.

I understand that a number of British cameramen will be required to film some of the Derby Day scenes for Maurice Tourneur, who is over here filming "The Christian" for Goldwyn.

Those who have been following the progress of Bert Ford as a snooker expert, will be interested to hear that he can now be seen on numerous occasions playing with the Club experts.

Frank Bassill's name crept into this page in our early copies last week as Frank "Bussill," which, for a topical cameraman, is quite a good appellation.

L. G. Egrot has fixed up with the Diamond Company to film "A Rogue in Love." Consequently, we now find Egrot at the B. and C. Studio, Walthamstow, hard at it, in the cause of his new firm.

Charlie Heath, of Topical Budget, has not been seen out with his camera much of late. The reason, I am told, is that he is giving more attention to indoor work than previously.

Pathé cameramen who filmed the fight between Carpentier and Lewis had no opportunity of their arms getting tired from turning, for the short period which the fight lasted saved them a great deal of effort. The fight film was short, but interesting, and well padded out with scenes of the rival boxers in training.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

LAST Saturday night the first Club Flannel Dance proved highly successful. The "Kine-Kopators" were there in full strength, with Pat Mannock at the piano, in place of Victor Peers, who was away on location. Pat gave a brilliant performance, his "Songs of Araby," one-step, being, to say the least, exceedingly cute. The hit of the evening was the vocal fox-trot entitled "Ma," rendered with numerous effects by the band.

To-night (Saturday) another Flannel Dance is to be held, when the club's swanee whistlist, Malcolm Tod, will forsake the band for a few minutes to give an exhibition fox-trot with Mdlle. Traffay, or as Tod prefers to put it, they will endeavour to show what "everybody's step" should really be.

The Billiard and Snooker handicaps are drawing to a close, the finals are to played off next week. Meanwhile the handicaps for the eight presentation cues are just about to start. The cues have been presented by Manning Haynes, Master Film Co., Frederick White Co., Goldwyn, Astra, Frank Miller, the Kinematograph Weekly, and the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO. Tony Fraser, Chairman of the Billiard Committee, and Harry Worth, secretary of that august body, are planning some novel tournaments to be announced at a future date.

Malcolm Tod tells me that the swimming section is going along nicely. The hot weather, he anticipates, will be influential in persuading more members to join this section of the club. Some may be interested to hear that in order to be a member of the swimming club, it is not necessary to be able to swim. The bath has a shallow end in which no one can get drowned! The club is to have swimming instructors to teach those who might get drowned how to avoid that fate!

The tennis section is going strong, except that so far it has been unable to obtain courts. Members who know of any courts available near London would considerably help this section by forwarding particulars and would enjoy the everlasting blessing of a harassed secretary.

The arrangements for club members to go to the Derby are proceeding apace. Quite a long list of names has been handed in and members are bringing their friends along with them. So far the Derby day party promises to be a exceedingly large and merry one.

SCREEN VALUES

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

"The Bohemian Girl."

Alliance—Starring Gladys Cooper, Ivor Novello, Ellen Terry, Constance Collier, Aubrey Smith, Henry Vibart, Gibb McLaughlin—Directed by Harley Knoles—Adapted by Harley Knoles and Rosina Henley—Photographed by Rene Guissart.

HARLEY KNOLES has attempted an ambitious task. He has achieved a triumph in many respects. The defects are not of that character that can adversely effect the box-office value of the picture, and—in a certain sense—these defects are not at all serious.

What he has done is to prove the almost insurmountable difficulties of making an opera into a film. He was a courageous man to try. For an opera depends, ninety per cent., on its music—it reduces story value to a minimum. Faced with a very slight story interest, Knoles has cast about in his mind for the means of overcoming this initial handicap. He decided on elaborate production methods and big names in the cast.

THIS IS NO. 50

orate production methods and big names in the cast.

The former is more successful than the latter. The luncheon scenes are excellent—in moderatum. They need cutting. The dream scenes of the marble halls and the ballroom scenes are magnificent. America has nothing to show to compare with them. They more than merited the applause they received.

We hasten to congratulate Knoles, by the way, on refraining from yielding to the temptation to take the luncheon scenes too close up—middle distance would have detracted from their value. Also, is he to be complimented on the superb skill with which he submits all the poetry of the dream scene with a pretty fanciful atmosphere that is with a pretty fanciful atmosphere that is irresistible in its charm.

The firework display at the Festival is excellent technically, but surely it is not true to period.

In our opinion the leads are in the wrong hands. The fame of the three chief artistes will, of course, make the film a commercial success. But not an artistic success. The chief disappointment is Ivor Novello, and his most disappointing scene that where, after being parted from Arline, he is smuggled into her boudoir to meet her for the last time. This scene lamentably fails in intensity. It is not convincing.

The scene of the Queen's denial of knowledge of the medallion is excellent in itself, but its dramatic values are not worked up to by the suspense of the scenes immediately preceding this.

Constance Collier's performance is good but theatrical (possibly the part tempted this), but Gladys Cooper does not sustain her part adequately.

Ellen Terry, whom we all revere, seems to have been cast for the sake of her name alone—which could possibly be said of other artistes. It is appalling to think that this will go out to America as a sample of the performance of our leading actress. Miss Terry should be allowed to bask in the sunshine of her wonderful past, and not used for the money-drawing power of her name.

Only on very rare occasions do we see glimpses of the great actress she has been.

Henry Vibart is the best in the cast, with Aubrey Smith a close second.

We congratulate the director and his bride on the skill with which they adapted the opera to the screen. While it is true that the story is thin, yet it is a source of surprise that it is not infinitely thinner. Continuity and maintenance of interest have been carefully attended to.

The other man who deserves high compliments is the cameraman. We can recall no instance of better kine-photography; this statement refers equally to American and European films. At times his results have a stereoscopic effect, and we admire the vignette style of close-up. The photographer has conspired with the director to secure the glamour of romance and the right atmosphere throughout.

"Perpetua."

F.-P. Lasky—Starring Ann Forrest and David Powell—Supported by Bunty Fosse, Amy Willard, Frank Stanmore, Roy Byford, Geoffrey Kerr, Dick Webb, Ida Fane, John Milner, Pollie Emery, Florence Wood and Lilian Walker—Directed by John Robertson.

"PERPETUA" possesses a certain amount of charm, and, taking everything into consideration, can be described as a success. John Robertson has taken care in the direction of the artistes in his cast, and has been instrumental in enabling Lasky to place before us a first-class film production.

The acting is for the most part of high standard; one of the cleverest performances, due in no small measure to the direction, is that of Bunty Fosse, a clever child actress, who invests her part with a delightful charm.

David Powell plays his role well, and Ann Forrest gives an attractive study as Perpetua.

Frank Stanmore reaches a high level of histrionic ability.

Roy Byford is excellent as the Ring Master, and Amy Willard's performance is good.

The continuity is not too even, and many unnecessary characters have been introduced, who tend to distract attention from the main theme. On the whole, however, the scenario is quite good.

Photographically, the production is excellent. Some of the lighting effects are striking and are worthy of special mention.

By Permission.

THERE is an aspect of the problem of British film producing that may not be referred to in the series of articles on "Saving the Situation," which we are publishing, and to which strong reference can be made in these columns. This is the opposition that the British film industry encounters from Government departments and public authorities. There are, of course, the notorious obstructionist methods of the police, and other public bodies, which come under the control of the Home Office. We could recall instances galore illustrating the indecent relish with which the police seek to prevent British film directors obtaining shots of scenes of public and international interest. A view of the riders in Rotten Row may not even be secured unless a battalion of officials have signed, re-signed, and counter-signed numerous permits. Usually, by the time these permits have reached the correct fruity degree the sun has gone in, and the scene cannot be taken. This obstructionist policy is in direct contrast to that which obtains in America, and yet our critics are asking why our films are not so interesting, convincing and realistically staged as the Americans'.

Governmental Incompetence.

THEN there is another instance of Governmental blundering which is having a deleterious effect on the industry. During the war, under the Finance Act of 1915, a tax was placed on films imported into this country. This was done ostensibly in the interests of native productions, but—such is the asinine incompetence of the Government—this tax reacts to the hurt of the British producing industry. Let us state a concrete case to show what we mean. It was announced in the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO some months ago that Merrick Milton had left this country for the Canary Islands, where he was to direct "The Adventures of Captain Kettle" for the Captain Kettle Film Company of London. On arriving at the Canary Islands, he was treated with great consideration and courtesy by the authorities, and thanks to their assistance, he was able to return to this country a few days ago with 30,000 feet of negative film. His intention was to cut and edit this negative and reduce it to a four-reel film. On arrival at Gravesend, he was informed by the Customs officials that he must pay a tax of 5d. per foot on the thirty thousand feet. "The Adventures of Captain Kettle " are in bond; to obtain their release a sum of £625 has to be paid!

* * *

Forcing Money into Foreign Hands.

THIS, then, is the position: the British director who is forced, in his search for realistic natural settings, to go abroad for scenes, is not even placed on the same level as foreign competitors, but is actually put at a disadvantage with them, he being forced to bring in every foot of the negative film taken, despite the fact that half of it will be thrown away in the cutting room.

.....

Q What is the use of being British if you can't act according? The word "British" isn't an adjective: it is a description of personal character.

To be really and truly British one naturally and instinctively puts up a big fight and does not sheathe the sword until victory is assured.

Q If you throw up the sponge now you can be sure you are doing the most un-British-like thing possible. Fight it out!

whereas the foreign producing concerns only send into this country the finished (cut and edited) film. British directors are finding a slight refuge from the oppression by having their negatives developed and cut in foreign laboratories. This only introduces to foreign laboratories work and money that ought to come into those at home.

* * *

Mr. Newbould's Chance.

FOREIGN directors, then, are placed at an advantage over British directors by Governmental blundering. The case of "The Adventures of Captain Kettle" illuminates the situation vividly. This film (destined to be a four-reeler), made by a British director, with British artistes, for a British company, will cost £625 in bond dues, while a foreign production, say an American four-reeler, can enter this country at a cost of less than £20, the tax on the positive film being one penny per foot. This state of affairs is nothing short of scandalous. It is hindering and hampering British film companies in their desperate fight against foreign competition, and reducing the quality of British films because directors sacrifice excellent foreign locations sooner than pay hundreds of pounds in bond dues. Maurice Tourneur and William Fox can come into this country and secure scenes in their respective films on the actual locations, and take the negative back to America without any restriction or imposition either here or at the other side. What is now needed is a more adequate representation in Parliament. At present A. E. Newbould is the recognised member for this constituency, and we are among those who are admirers of Mr. Newbould; but we feel that personal admiration should not be allowed to influence this matter, and quite deliberately we say that the interests of the British film producing industry are not being served, nor its cause championed, nor its detractors denounced, nor its enemies challenged in Parliament as firmly and as effectively as ought to be the case. We appeal to Mr. Newbould either to do his utmost for this industry or to leave the job to some more able representative and advocate. For the Government should be forced to remove this iniquitous imposition referred to, and at least give to British productions the same consideration that it so readily gives to foreign films.

Next Week.

READERS will be charitable enough to forgive our personal pride in the fact that the next issue will mark the first year's existence of the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO. We are not in the least afraid for the future: any film paper that could be born in the most distressful days of the film industry and live through the industry's worst year, has within its being the germs of journalistic immortality. The next issue will be a Double Number to mark the occasion, and we can promise readers a treat. Within artistically coloured covers will be 30 pages of extra-special articles and advertising features. And we have taken great pains to let all America and the Continent know that the British film industry is virile, robust, and triumphant even in the dark days.

Intimate Studio Gossip

The MOTION PICTURE STUDIO joins in the general offer of condolences with Rex Davis on the severe loss he has just sustained by the death of his mother. The late Mrs. Davis charmed everyone who knew her by her sweet disposition, and Rex would be the first to acknowledge the great debt he owes to such a choice spirit. Our sympathies go out to Graham Davis (who is the hon. solicitor at the Club), who has been devoted in his attention to Mrs. Davis during her long illness.

I spent an interesting day with Maurice Tourneur on location last week. The company included Richard Dix, the American star, and British supports and crowd, the latter being supplied by John Payne, of Bramlins. The venue was part of the slum district of Somers Town, and the flashes of Cockney humour (among other things) that were revealed by the slum-dwellers was really interesting. George Hodges, as the bully, was engaged in a very strong scene with Margaret Dean and Richard Dix, and was eventually knocked out by the last-named. This scene was rehearsed about ten times by Tourneur (who is a stickler for detail), and so both Margaret Dean and Hodges had a very rough time of it for an hour in the scorching sun.

Over lunch I asked Tourneur whether the sunshine of California was any stronger than that that we were then experiencing. And he replied that it was seldom—if ever—any hotter out there or the light any better. "As a matter of fact," he said, "I am sometimes tempted to think that the perfect photographic conditions in California can be a drawback in a certain sense. You see we know out there that the sun that shines to-day will also shine to-morrow, and so we are inclined to 'leave for to-morrow the scenes that should be shot to-day.' Here, however, your days of sunshine are so precious that full advantage is taken of them on the spot."

I took a trip out to Ealing this week to see Edward D. Roberts at work directing the first of a series of two-reel comedies for the Albania Film Co. Each film of this series is to feature a well-known artiste, and will be characteristically English. The cast of the first—"The Cause of all the Trouble"—is exceptionally strong, as it co-stars Flora Le Breton and George K. Arthur, with Olaf Hytten, Sydney Paxton and Bertie White in the supporting cast. Mr. Roberts tells me this film is now in the last stages of production, and I am now awaiting with keen interest the premiere of this new company. By the way, Albania Films is open to consider scenarios for comedies. These should be of the "Drew" type and sent to St. Albans; they will be returned if unsuitable.

Next Wednesday there is a jolly party going from the club to see the Derby, and if the fates are kind (and editorial and advertising copy for the Double Number reaches me early) I hope to be among the number. From what I hear there will be quite a film crowd there, for in addition to the several chaps-a-banc loads from 9, Great Newport Street, Maurice Tourneur will have his company down there shooting scenes, while the Gazette people will also be taking advantage of the occasion to secure topical scenes.

And I am informed that this year's Derby is to be filmed in a way which is believed to be entirely new. The spectators will see the famous race from start to finish without any interruption. This picture is being made by Walter West, and he will use it for an important part of the new racing film he is now making, "Son of Kissing Cup." Mr. West has obtained the use of several advantageous points on the course, where he will erect platforms, from which the race will be photographed. He will have twelve cameramen under his direction. This, however, does not include the secret arrangement he is working to secure the film which, he says, will show the public something even those who attend the meeting cannot see. Violet Hopson and Stewart Rome, who are playing the leading parts in the film, are to act certain scenes among the real Derby Day crowd. For the other scenes, which need rehearsal, Mr. West is building an exact replica of part of the Grand Stand.

Hal Martin met with rather a serious accident recently while working on the new Welsh-Pearson production, "A Sailor Tramp." In one scene Martin had to run up the rigging, to the top of the mast and dive off into the water. Something went wrong, however, and he fell, injuring himself seriously. He is now in hospital suffering from the effects of his fall. I extend my sympathies to him and hope for his very speedy recovery.

Those who have been fortunate enough to get fixed up for "The Price of Silence," with Fred Le Roy Granville, look like enjoying a very happy time. A special yacht is to be chartered to take the company to Tripoli, where the exteriors are to be filmed. All those mentioned in our "Where they are and what they are doing" page as being in the company are going on this trip. The company leaves during the first weeks of June.

Miles Mander and Adrian Brunel are as enterprising as ever. Their latest venture is to secure the sole rights for the filming of the present World Flight. Geoffrey Malins, O.B.E., who became famous for his cinematograph work for the Government during the war, is going as far as Athens with an escorting aeroplane for the purpose of filming the flight. The negative will be developed en route and sent back to this country by plane. Brunel then cuts and edits the film, which will be shown exclusively at the Poly Kinema in Regent Street. The first instalment of the film will be shown next Wednesday.

NUMBER 51

A YEAR ago and the optimists of 1921 gave the new MOTION PICTURE STUDIO three months to live. But we have cheated the newspaper undertakers and outgrown our coffin. During the next few days the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO celebrates its first birthday, and to mark the occasion an anniversary double number will be issued next week.

This will contain many highly interesting editorial features, including a group of three articles on "What is wrong with British Productions," each being an outspoken article that cannot fail to do much good. "Principles of Film Criticism," and "British Films Abroad," are two other important articles, while Florence Turner, Geoffrey Malins and Adrian Brunel tell how they would have run the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO had they been editor. These are only a few of the editorial contents.

We have never failed to preach the gospel of publicity, and so we have prepared some excellent advertising features through which artistes, directors, scenarists and cameramen can make known their work to the whole world. Already spaces have been acquired by many of the enterprising, and we confidently recommend all who have learned the lesson that it pays to advertise, to get in quickly on what we know must be the best advertising scheme members of the profession have ever had offered them.

Editorial contributions are invited, but all copy—editorial and advertising—must reach this office by first post on Monday at the latest. The Double Number, in coloured covers, will be on sale on Friday morning.

TOURNEUR IN TROUBLE

ON Tuesday last, Maurice Tourneur had a large company of artistes working on big scenes for "The Christian" in Clifford's Inn. The artistes were supplied for the crowd scenes by Bramlins, and they were on duty from 7 p.m. to 4 a.m. and the payment was to be one guinea per person.

After they had been at work until past midnight, several of the artistes approached Max Rosher (Bramlin's representative on the spot) and suggested that as they were working through the night and had no means of transport to their homes, Maurice Tourneur might be prepared to increase the payment. Rosher passed the suggestion on to I. Cohn, Goldwyn's production manager, and that gentleman offered an extra five shillings all round. This was rejected by a percentage of the crowd as not being sufficient, whereupon Cohn took the "Take it or leave it" attitude.

This incensed some of the artistes, and accordingly, Tourneur himself was approached. Acting on his advice, Rosher invited those who were prepared to accept the offer to stand on one side of the court and those who pressed for 30s. on the other. This being done, Cohn declared that he would pay 30s. to those who had been content to accept the first offer, while the discontented would get no more than the original guinea.

This attitude quickly stirred the artistes, who began to express their opinions very forcibly, but negotiations between Rosher and Tourneur resulted in all being paid thirty shillings.

COMPARATIVE VIEW OF SCENARIOS

by COLIN N. BENNETT, Technical Expert: The Kinematograph Weekly

We hear a good deal about the need for turning out better and more interesting motion picture films. A writer in the Kine., only two or three weeks ago, pointed out with great justice that the trouble with the average present-day release was not that it was deliberately padded, but that no part of it was more than mildly interesting. The same writer went on to evolve a thesis that if a film were pruned of its duller portions between the "stunts," or punchful incidents, this would not brighten the screen story up but rather would make it less interesting than ever. For the material for film "punch" has first of all to be provided, a little at a time, before the stunt can draw upon it.

There is a good old-fashioned motto which says, "One thing at a time." Were we to follow out that motto in photoplay construction things would have to be as outlined above. But scenario writing is rather a new-fashioned art, and the man who scores heaviest at it is he who can best attend to two things at a time—namely, the handling of material for his future interest so that it provides present interest also. This takes doing, but it can be done, and, as we all know, occasionally is done. For instance, when Charles Chaplin nursed the babe in the garret (in his film "The Kid") he was preparing the situation for a very definite exile and return stunt, timed for the conclusion of the film, but incidentally managed, by delineation of a humorously distorted, yet none the less sturdy, parental affection, to provide a continuous supply of present interest as well. "What has been done can be done again." That motto, at any rate, is as weatherproof as ever. Artificers of scenarios might with advantage take it as their guide and counsellor.

It has been said of American-made films that you can generally rely upon their stories, however banal or threadbare, reaching at least a moderate level of emotional interest. With British films the stories are often more original, and generally much more varied in their details. Instead of that earning for them a higher general level of drawing power, however, we all know how enormous are the fluctuations in drawing power between production and production coming from the same British producer. That, if true, may sound rather dismal for British productions. As a matter of fact, it is not so. It simply means our own scenarists and producers, instead of being content to be past-masters of the simple and the trite, prefer to venture into deeper water, even though it should place them in temporary difficulties.

Our home-produced films are full of evidences of this constitutionally exploratory, pioneering state of mind. Where the American makes use of a specially written screen-play having a central theme of elementary and obvious emotion, or where he chooses for screen adaptation a large proportion of the brainless "best seller" type of book, the British producing house seeks to adapt for the screen books written by great authors, having plots full of subtlety. Alternatively we find our original British screen scenarios possessed of plots with almost as many and devious ramifications.

It is as though we were watching a competition between two marksmen, both using similar rifles and targets of equal size, the one shooting at a range of three hundred yards and the other at a range of three thousand yards. We can appreciate that an "outer" scored at the longer range might be evidence of as great, or greater, marksmanship than a "bull" at the shorter range. But, suppose prizes were being decided on the actual scoring, range not allowed for, and is there much doubt which of our competitors would win the contest? Apply the simile to motion picture competition, and we shall the better appreciate the importance of doing what we can to wipe out the handicap. How to do it? If only we would hit on a way, and would act accordingly, there is little doubt about British films drawing in much bigger crowds to British picture theatres in the near future.

Let us see, if we can, where our home-produced scenarios are at a disadvantage with scenarios of other countries. We find the bulls of foreign-made film stories possessing little other outstanding intrinsic merit than that they are first and foremost filmable. This quality is usually secured by eliminating subtlety, sticking to the obvious and working along lines of elementary emotion first, foremost, and all the time. As against it, the British photoplay is often subtle, seldom entirely trite, but given to be prolix in plot, and, worst of all, liable to wander from the plot in order to expand and preen itself over minor scenes and situations of no value to the story proper. Here is where the British director seems to us to make a big mistake. He muddles up the minor situation which docs contribute something to the "punch" of the main film story with that other sort of minor situation, pretty or interesting in itself though it may be, which does not assist the main trend of the film story, but rather retards it.

For instance, the action of a film may be taking place in the garden of an old Tudor country house. Our British director, on arriving on location, experiences a minor shock from the loveliness of his surroundings, and is thereby led to prolonging a single minor situation over three or four shots, simply that the most may be made of available and beautiful vistas of background and middle distance. From the æsthetic point of view there is great excuse for this, but from the dramatic point of view it is quite wrong. American films don't exhibit the fault nearly so often.

Or, again, perhaps we are directing a film version of a well-known historical novel. Our director realises a point has been reached where, by permitting a pause in the weaving of the web of the story for a hundred feet or so, he can introduce intimate bits of character study of well-known personages of the time. From the historical and educational standpoint, even from the literary standpoint, there is everything to be said for the idea, but from the film-making standpoint it is as much help toward reaching the dénouement as a fifteen minutes' stop at Crewe, on the L and N.W. Railway, is useful in hastening up the train journey from London to Carlisle.

As M. Coué has recently been telling us, the essence of the "punch" in auto-suggestion, as in pugilism, is the speed with which you put it over. And equally, the speed with which the shuttle of a film plot keeps plying over web and woof of the story is the most essential part of forcing a telling and punchful dénouement. Where would Fairbanks be if he played slow, and called a halt at every two hundred feet to show us some of the local views of Texas, or to introduce to our notice camera portraits of the past Presidents of Mexico?

The next step along our inquiry into brightening up films will lead from the necessity of keeping the story from travelling to the importance of keeping it to the main emotional track. This does not mean we should be banal, but it does mean we should start our scenario with a precise knowledge of what constitutes its appeal, or "kick," and thenceforward every situation should be simplified into being definitely contributory to that appeal.

Above all things, our wish to pass the censor should never lead to the folly of filming a book plot in such a way that its essence is lost in the screen version. Many years ago—maybe eight—we were given a screen version of Robert Hichens' "Flames." Now the whole essence of the plot of "Flames" is bound up in the progress toward the light of an "unfortunate," who ends in regaining her own soul by sacrificing her life for the soul of her friend. The screen version of "Flames" represented the "lady of the feathers" as a "perfectly respectable shorthand typist." Suppose we concede that the character in its original form would have been unsuitable for portrayal on the "pictures," what would have been the right thing to do about filming the book containing it? Why, not to film the book, of course.

As another example of watered-down "punch" we have recently been given a version of Merrick's masterpiece representing Conrad as a marrying man, and his helper in finding his youth as a coy maiden. Was it really impossible to tell the truth and show Conrad as "one of the boys" and let it be known that the husband of the Blithedale girl was alive and kicking?

Psychologists (who love darkness rather than light) sum up this need, for keeping to the thing that tells, by saying you "mustn't displace the psychic accent." Really the phrase is rather helpful, for it supplies a distinct suggestion of the ease with which, say, a mechanical contrivance, such as a grandfather clock, can be thrown out of beat by careless meddling with its mechanism.

So far we have dwelt on the paramount need for two things:—We must keep going with our story all the while, and at a smart pace, from its start to its finish. Also, when confronted with the offer of a good story, the producer and scenarist should either use it or refuse it, but should not "muck it about" (as the coster said).

Our third need is to stick strictly to the filmable, when film-making. A producing house which essays, for instance, to film Oscar Wilde's plays is of necessity producing an empty shell, for in none of these plays is the plot intended to do anything more than encase the dialogue.

What director alive can show us how to render into visual form that sublime piece of repartee, "When I was young"—"But you have never been young"? Put it into a sub-title? Of course. But, at that rate, why not print the whole play in sub-title form? Or has anyone yet given us a "visualised" Omar Khayyam? Undoubtedly no one has done so, nor ever can, though there is plenty of time for some fearless knight of the producing studio to attempt this impossibility as well.

The filmable can be known at once from the unfilmable, for with it, as in life, chief value lies in action and not in words. Provided action is there, that it is the essential part of the story, and that it is capable of being put on the screen without meddling with its "psychic accent," only two more things remain before we may safely transplant our plot to the screen. We must assure ourselves the tree is sound and healthy, and potentially fruitful of human, easily assimilable emotional situations, and we must give it a thorough pruning, so that every flower that opens and every fruit that forms, may in due time go to swell the dainty dessert we hope at last to set before our kinema patrons.

SAVING THE SITUATION

by ERNEST G. ALLIGHAN.

III.—American and British Press on American Films.

RECENTLY it has become the fashion to scoff at British productions as though "inefficiency" and "British" were synonyms. After-dinner speakers at Trade functions have sneered at national films, and held them up to ridicule, and compared them with American films to the glorification of the latter. There may be a certain limited, and well-defined sense, in which this attitude is justifiable, but if all the facts are carefully studied I am convinced that the detractors of our native film product will discover that the grounds for their insensate ridicule are not so well established as is commonly supposed.

In the first place, it must not be imagined that American films can boast the immaculate character that the detractors of British films so glibly ascribe to them. I have before me at the present moment the four last numbers of the American film trade papers. These are extracts from the reviews of some of the latest American pictures:—

"That there is no rhyme or reason to the story is of absolutely no consequence."

"No special effort towards achieving anything unusual has been made in this feature."

"The star has little to do except look youthful and appealing."

"... a difficult job, taking into consideration that such a character has never existed."

"Every few feet something takes place that promotes a cavalcade of speeding cowboys... there is so much dust raised by the gallopers that an impressionable spectator will not be able to refrain from sneezing."

"Like several other good motion picture actors, Charles Ray is, apparently, suffering from the lack of good plays in which to appear, and as a result is wasting his talents on inferior material."

"An apparent lack of experience is characteristic of most of the cast, Mildred Harris seems not entirely free from affectation."

"The thread on which the incident is hung is not strong enough... Those who think for themselves will readily see the story's weaknesses... there are interludes of foolishness that seem to have been injected for no particular purpose... it appears to be unnecessarily padded."

"With such a wealth of material the directors could have refrained from obvious blunders."

"The picture, as it stands now, is nonsensical, and will make a hit only with those who attach no value at all to their time."

"The story is poorly told and senseless."

These are extracts from a trade press that is notoriously amenable to the influence of its advertisers, and, in a land of graft, is never unduly hesitant when it comes to prostituting its editorial columns in the interests of its advertisement department. I would now refer the reader to the reviews of American films to be found in the last issue of the Kine Weekly, which has a high reputation for honesty, and is notoriously impervious to the influence of advertisements:—

"There is only very moderate entertainment value in this production, due to the tedious dragging out of story and incident, and still more to the mishandling of nearly all the dramatic opportunities."

"This drama... is a crude mixture of farce and romance that only the most uncritical will find to their taste. Fifteen years ago it might have passed muster, but it is entirely unworthy of the modern screen... The production is poor in every way."

"The story is very slight and ordinary, long-drawn out, lacking in grip, and tiring."

"Has very little to offer in the way of novelty or originality... it is unlikely to suit really critical audiences."

"This is a thorough conventional Western drama with the usual somewhat confusing and unconvincing plot. It contains... a glimpse at an attempted rape by a drunken man, which is as unnecessary and repulsive as such scenes always are."

It will be seen by these extracts that the Trade Press of the two countries have no erroneous ideas about the alleged immaculate quality of American films, and that these are capable of being the objects of just as much adverse criticism as British films. But there is another point that the detractors of our national productions blissfully overlook: Only the cream of the American output reaches this country. The process of elimination that the commercial competitive system involves weeds out the second, third and fourth-rate American films so that those that are shown on British screens are America's best. And at this very moment American studios are producing and American exhibitors are screening films that are infinitely worse than the worst that this country has ever made. That fact must not be ignored. And in view of it I claim that it is not fair to British films to judge them on the result of comparison with the best American productions. Give to British films the same rights and privileges that are accorded to American productions.

WHAT OUR READERS THINK

The series of articles on "Saving the Situation" has elicited a shoal of letters from readers in all phases of the industry as well as financiers. A well-known film financier has asked for 100 reprints of last week's article for purposes of propaganda, and other financial people have expressed keen interest in the campaign. We print three representative letters from the number that we have received.

I am afraid you will find it very difficult to "produce those returns and prove those dividends" to the satisfaction of the Stock Exchange, because so much capital in the past has got into the hands of those who could talk rather than those who could work. The unprecedented collapse has not come about because profits have been made, but because the last shilling has been lost.

I think, however, that my three years' record at Shoreham would stand the most searching investigation; but it is a record of very hard work, in which the true value of the goods being produced was never lost sight of. To get value for money seems to have been thought unnecessary in the past. I confidently assert that profits can be made out of pictures, even if they are produced for the British market alone. May I express the fervent hope that if your propaganda achieves the deserved results, no such limited enterprise will be embarked on?

There is a world market for a world standard. This standard has been reached commercially. It can be reached commercially—SIDNEY MORGAN.

Regarding your investigations into the financial side of film production, there is one suggestion that I should like to make; it is that you issue a Financial Supplement, putting the case for investment in sound film production enterprises, at the same time advising how prospective investors are to judge what is a sound proposition.

I would also like to suggest that a fund should be started by those financially interested in British film production to assist in the distribution of this supplement, which should be sent, with personal letters, to the City editors of big newspapers, to the directors of banks, members of Parliament, picture theatre owners, financiers, organisations like the Federation of British Industries, and others whom your readers might suggest.—ADRIAN BRUNEL.

I am extremely interested in your new series of articles "Saving the Situation." There is no hiding the fact that the British trade is in a sorry plight, simply because it cannot get the necessary capital to "Save the Situation." If your excellent series of articles, can, as I have no doubt they will, arouse the British financier, and prove to him that in this industry there is money still to be made, then you will have succeeded in doing a great service to the industry and, incidentally, to the British financier, for I am confident that a film company—providing it has sufficient capital—can turn out work equal to anything turned out in any other country.

Hitherto, financiers, who have turned their attention to the film business, have, in my opinion gone wrong in one way. They have entrusted their money into the wrong hands. Their money has been squandered and wasted, by people who know nothing of the business, but are skilled in the art of bluff. If some method could be devised by which financiers could be certain that their money was going into the right hands, then we might find more of them turning their attention and putting their money into the film industry. If something could only be done to stop those bluffers, to whom I referred above, from getting money and wasting it, and thus frightening off financiers the situation would indeed be saved.

To do this, we need someone to speak for us, some one to lay before the financial world the whole facts of the case. The MOTION PICTURE STUDIO cannot do this without the co-operation of directors, heads of producing concerns and those connected with the British producing profession. These should all band together, prepare the facts, and submit them. It is our only hope for the future.—I enclose my card, and sign myself "Amicus."

Record of Activities of Kine-Cameramen

PUBLICISE YOURSELF

ONE of the phases of the picture business hitherto neglected by cameramen is publicity. It has been said that in this profession publicity is the breath of life. Most of our stars owe their popularity and their success, not so much to their own ability, as to the ability of their publicity agent. Truly publicity has a far-reaching effect.

Cameramen, in their struggle for recognition, ignore this angle—British cameramen do at least, for the American has long been alive to its possibilities and has helped himself to it in liberal quantities. To become a famous cameraman, a man must turn out extraordinarily good work and must be well-known. One without the other leads to nowhere. A cameraman can turn out good work, but unless he draws the attention of the picturegoer, the director, and the profession generally to the fact that his work is good, it will, in most cases, go by quite unnoticed.

But why is it that the cameraman does not share in any of the publicity which the director and the artiste obtain? It will be found that the fault chiefly lies with the cameraman. He does not go about it in the proper way. He is content to have his name on the film, but does not insist on it in the synopsis; neither does he worry if his firm's publicity man sends out write-ups about everyone in the studio except the cameraman. He lets these things go unnoticed, serenely believing that if he can turn out good work, he is bound to be recognised in time. But it is a mistaken idea, he will not be recognised, and so long as he is content just to let a few personal friends know that he is going to show them something good at his next trade show, so long as he keeps this information in his own little circle, just so long he will go unknown and strive in vain to get the recognition he deserves. By a combination of good work and good publicity the cameraman can gain the high status in the profession for which he has long strived. Publicity is the secret of success, providing the man who tries it can supply what he promises therein.

TRADE PRINTING AGAIN

REPLYING to references in a recent "Focus" article on the need for sufficient recognition of the cameramen, Leslie Eveleigh, of Davidsons, writes:—

We are not all in the happy position of having facilities for developing our own negatives, or even being in the dark room while they are being developed; and who of us have not had a rude shock, upon examination of a batch of negative just returned from development, to find some of it "baked," while other rolls would have benefited from another couple of minutes in the juice? It is at times a heart-breaking business to be working in a studio which has no facilities for development of negative upon the spot.

So far as I, personally, am concerned, I have been extremely lucky in this respect, having been connected, for some years now, with studios which have their own plants, and where I have been able to be at hand when my stuff was going through. At the present moment I count myself favoured of the gods inasmuch as I am at a studio where negative is developed in Pyro, a developing agent which for years I have been advocating for film, but, unhappily, only as a voice crying in the wilderness.

To my mind, the man who develops negative, whether he be the cameraman himself or no, has the greatest responsibility on his shoulders of anyone connected with the making of the film. Does he always realise that responsibility? Because, after all, it is about the simplest job in the world to "do in" a negative, even though it be exposed by the cleverest cameraman in the universe.

Let us leave the development of negative for a moment and turn to the print. How does the question of recognition affect us in this? Let me quote an experience of a week or so ago. I walked into a picture house which was showing a film on which I had turned. At the Trade show of this picture, the Trade Press had been particularly kind to me when speaking of the quality. When being shown in the picture house, the quality was—well, you know as well as I do.

I am afraid that at present the question of quality does not entirely rest with the cameraman; he is very often blamed for the sins of another.

CAMERAMEN
AT WORK

I HAVE been following with interest the slow motion (ultra-rapid) pictures appearing in the "Pathé Pictorial" and "Around the Town." The subjects dealt with have been many and varied, and the results of the slowing down of the action has in most cases been instrumental in showing some amazing and unexpected movements. Olaf Hytten mentioned rather a novel idea to me the other day. It was that two actors be secured to go through a very dramatic scene, and that the result be recorded on an ordinary camera and an ultra-rapid one. The result should be interesting in the extreme, and I would like to see some firm give this suggestion a try.

Derby Day promises to be a big day for cameramen for the supply of kine-camera operators is not nearly equal to the demand, and as most cameramen are booked up for this day, big prices are being paid to secure the few remaining. Walter West is taking twelve cameramen on the course to film the race; another British producing concern is to have five or six; Maurice Tourneur is taking along a few more, and the topical firms should be represented by large numbers of men. Such events as these are always welcomed by the cameraman.

Some of the best views of London I have ever witnessed on the screen appear in "Lord Arthur Savile's Crime," the Anglo-French production, which was Trade-shown last week. The view of the Houses of Parliament, with Big Ben lit up, and the moon in the background disappearing behind the clouds, was received with an outburst of applause. The cameraman was a Frenchman; but as he was given nearly three months in which to film these few London scenes, he had an advantage over the average English photographer. Another notable bit of work in the picture is the scene where the girl walks out of the frame, down the table, and back.

During the heat wave D. P. Cooper and Jack Cox were to be envied, they being away up among the Alpine snows, while other of their cameramen friends sweltered and toiled in the merciless sunshine. One of the most unlucky cameramen during the week has been Arthur Kingston, who has been working down at Barker's, which, of course, is a daylight studio and is apt to become very warm when the sun shines.

HISTRIONICS AS A SCIENCE

by COLONEL NETTERVILLE BARRON, C.M.G., M.V.O.

By the courtesy of H. L. Barber, the editor of the "Aetor," we commence this week a series of articles on the scientific aspect of acting. Colonel Barron is a physician and dramatist and is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Medicine. He is the author of "The Three Brothers" and other wordless plays, and founded the Windsor Forest School of Physical Culture. He is well known as a lecturer on the Art of Dramatic Expression.

AN actor is a man who moves dramatically with a particular object in view.

The art is the movement, the object is to "get across." The art of an actor, like the art of a pianist or the art of a painter, is an affair of bodily movement. It differs from the other arts in that, until recently, it could not be handed down to posterity. Now it can, and we shall presently find that the art of the actor has suddenly taken on a vastly greater importance.

The art of the actor is commonly regarded as interpretative, rather than creative as is that of the painter or the composer. He is classed in this respect with the executant musician. These distinctions need not concern us, since we propose to deal only with that aspect of art which is peculiar to the actor.

Acting, then, is an art of movement, but the art is actually the movement itself, the action, which is drama (meaning action).

The history of drama shows us how acting has developed from the magical rites of priests via religious and festal dancing, through the mining of mountebanks, to Sarah Siddons and Forbes Robertson. The invention of cinematography has carried it a step further, in a different direction if at present on a far lower plane.

Like the Harley Street specialist, the actor has a dubious ancestry, and, like the doctor, he has only with great difficulty struggled free of the memories associated with mediæval charlatanism. Unfortunately, the actor is in some danger of slipping back in the social scale. It is largely his own fault. He has allowed himself to be exploited by interests bearing no relationship to his art. It is the day of the avowed showman instead of the day of the great producer. American kinema methods, coupled with American sexuality, have done the actor no good.

The actor tends to scamp his art because he has forgotten that it is an art of movement, and has come to regard it as a cross between literature and rhetoric. Acting is not a matter of beauty of form coupled with a reasonable sense of elocution. Drama is action, an actor is an artist of action, action is movement.

The crisis of our argument must obviously be determined by our conception of movement. Scientifically, everything is movement. The movements to which we refer are dramatic movements—gesture—whether they be the coarse gestures of passion or the fine and hardly noticeable twitch of the fingers associated with the swift passage of an emotionalised thought. Dramatic movements include the movements of the vocal chords in speech. Speech is not a necessary part of drama, as can be seen in the wordless play, but because speech is the easiest, and, in many cases, the only way to express thought, it has usurped a paramount position compared with the other dramatic movements. Dramatic movements include pauses and poses, since the essence of both is there before and there after. A pause is only dramatic because of its context, which, of course, is always a movement.

Let us now turn to a closer analysis of dramatic movements. Have they any peculiarity, any distinguishing characteristic, can they be learned by practice, and how many of them are there? We must answer the first two questions in the affirmative, and the last by dividing them into classes, of which there are some twenty-five.

Dramatic movements are peculiar in that they have to "get across." It is not enough to be natural, it is not enough to get inside your part; the movements must have the dramatic attribute, else were the part of an angry coalheaver best played by a coalheaver suitably irritated.

Dramatic movements, provided their nature be understood, can be learned by practice, just as the scales and exercises of the musician are learned.

Most dramatic movements are emotional. Some are not, as, for instance, the centralising gesture an actor may make when he wishes to arrest the attention of a stage crowd. Some are merely miming, others are indicative, purposive, or empirical, like the movements familiarised by the Russian Ballet and the pseudo-Eastern movements of many solo dancers.

Drama is especially a recording of the emotions consequently the movements accompanying emotions in operation are of great importance to the actor. There are approximately fourteen primary emotions and some twenty, or more, secondary emotions. Contrary to the general belief, love is not included in either category.

The classification of the emotions will depend on the school of psychology to which you subscribe. In ordinary language, an emotion is the tone or colouring of an instinct; an instinct is an innate tendency to strive towards a particular end. For example, the instinct of hunger drives a man to strive towards a loaf of bread. The instinct of flight, with its emotion fear, drives a man to avoid tigers and policemen.

Set out below will be found a table of the chief primary instincts, with their accompanying emotions:—

INSTINCT.	EMOTION.
Sex.	Sex.
Parental.	Tenderness.
Gregarious.	Sympathy.
Pugnacity.	Anger.
Rivalry.	Emulation.
Curiosity.	Wonder.
Flight.	Fear.
Repulsion.	Disgust.
Self-nourishment.	Hunger, thirst.
Acquisition.	Acquisitive.
Construction.	Constructive.
Positive.	Display.
Negative.	Modesty.

Professor William McDougal, from whose important work, "An Introduction to Social Psychology," the list has been modified, gives a very complete and valuable analysis of a great number of emotions with their practical significance. For us, it is sufficient to point out that every primary emotion has its accompanying movement which exactly expresses it.

Our next article will describe these movements, and will endeavour to show how they can be, and should be, a part of the technique of every keen actor. They are, indeed, the notes on which will depend his success as a player. Surely, it is well that he should learn them.

CLUB CLATTER

by CLATTERBOX

THE flannel dance last Saturday night was another feather in the cap of all concerned, and that popular number "Syren of a Southern Sea," seemed to harmonise perfectly with the atmospheric conditions. Nevertheless the band got everybody jazzing at normal speed.

The band at present is making its own onesteps to a large extent out of almost extinct songs such as "Araby," "Rosary," etc., and last Saturday, the "Honey-suckle and the Bee." Cyril Percival caused much amusement as an eccentric conductor, howls of delight greeting him when the M.C. presented him with a bouquet (of radishes) in time to drum accompaniment.

The pièce de résistance of the evening was a delightfully original and eccentric fox trot given by Malcolm Tod and Marcelle Truffy, to the new number "Everybody's Step." We understand it was quite an impromptu show, and in view of this, compliment them both on their much appreciated efforts.

Our dances are a great success, and the only worry is that somebody may want to engage the band elsewhere. Tonight the Kinecopatens will start kinecopating at 8.30 as usual, and it is hoped that no one will let the heat worry them and will come in any dress they most fancy.

Harry Worth and Tony Fraser are being kept busy on the Billiards Committee, the great event at the moment being the second snooker and billiard handicaps. Alec Hunter now owns his own cue, which was presented to him by the Kine Weekly in recognition of his winning the club billiard handicap, and the runner-up in this event, Cyril Smith, is now in possession of a cue presented to him by Burroughs and Watts, in recognition of his skill. Arthur Walcott was runner-up in the snooker handicaps, and received the cue presented by the Kinema Club, as a result, while Jack Gordon, who is the winner of this event, received the cue given by the MOTION PICTURE STUDIO. Before long many more will own private cues at the club, for the second lot of handicaps in snooker and billiards will result in another four cues being presented to the winners and runners-up.

SCREEN VALUES

MEASURING UP THE WEEK'S PRODUCT

The Wonderful Story.

Astra—Starring Olaf Hytten, Herbert Langley and Lilian Hall Davies—Directed by Grahame Cutts—Photographed by L. G. Egrot.

IN undertaking to make such a film as this Grahame Cutts took upon himself a great deal of risk. The average director would have rejected it, because it was minus "punch," yet because of its simplicity it has turned out to be an achievement. Grahame Cutts' greatest achievement, however, is in having sufficient courage to translate this story into a screen drama.

The acting is of a high order, and is quite in keeping with the tone of the production.

Grahame Cutts has succeeded, without lavish expenditure on sets, crowds, stars and other accessories which are popularly supposed to make a film, in presenting a picture which is a credit to the profession, the artistes who appeared in it, the cameramen and the director.

The acting, as we have already said, is of a high order, and considerably assists in making the production the success it has turned out. Keeping in mind that they are only supposedly simple country labourers, the artistes act accordingly, without working themselves up into a frenzied state of emotion.

Herbert Langley, a newcomer to the screen, gives a fine performance. His part is a difficult one to portray, owing to the fact that most of his acting has to be done, lying on his back in bed, as an invalid. So much more credit to him, therefore, in succeeding in putting over a part in which many others would have failed.

Olaf Hytten, who has been used to playing heavies up till the date of this production, shows himself in a new light, that of a farm labourer. This production clearly proves that as an actor Hytten can be as good in a straight as in a "heavy" role. As a result of his work in this film Hytten should become more in demand for straight parts.

Lilian Hall Davies has made very few screen appearances lately, but her work in this production should make her services more in demand. As the woman, she is excellent, and excels any previous roles in which she has appeared.

Bernard Vaughan gives an equally good performance as the vicar, and all the minor roles—there are only a few, the picture being practically dependent upon the work of the three artistes playing lead—are well filled.

The scenario and the continuity are excellent. The picture runs smoothly from start to finish—no annoying "stunts" are included to add punch and break the story—everything goes on in a perfectly straightforward manner.

Photography is magnificent. L. G. Egrot has done exceedingly well with what little material was at his command. Here is an example of a picture which, if badly photographed, would have been a failure. In securing a good man Grahame Cutts has been very fortunate.

SUMMARY.

Direction—Superb.
Leads—Admirable.
Supports—Suitable.
Literary—Excellent.
Lighting—Well placed.
Photography—First-class.
Exteriors—Well chosen.
Interiors—Simple, but effective.

Lord Arthur Savile's Crime.

W. and F.—Starring André Nox—supported by Cecil Mannering, Olive Sloane and Cecil Morton Yorke—Directed by René Hervil—Cameraman not credited.

THIS Anglo-French production is of special interest because it shows what co-operation between the French and English trade can do.

The picture has been well directed, and is chiefly notable for the fine acting and extraordinarily good photography.

Unfortunately the brilliant Oscar Wilde witticisms have not been used. The sub-titles are for the most part not very good, and would have been greatly improved if some of Oscar Wilde's scintillating epigrams had been used.

Those who have read Oscar Wilde's works will be disappointed with the film; those who have not will find this something out of the ordinary run in the way of comedies.

The acting is particularly brilliant, André Nox giving far and away the best performance as the old fortune teller.

Cecil Mannering as Lord Savile, makes his part thoroughly effective, and carries it through in a manner with which little fault could be found.

Olive Sloane is pretty as the girl, and gives an excellent portrayal of the part. It is a pity that she has not been seen in more English productions, for she is a type of artiste not very often seen in British films.

Cecil Morton Yorke gives a remarkably clever study of the Disagreeable Dean, acquitting himself well.

The scenarist has slightly altered the story; his reason for doing so, not being very obvious. On the whole he has done his work well, and the continuity runs smoothly.

The photography is one of the outstanding points. The views of London are certainly the best ever seen on the films, and are a feature in themselves, particularly the scene of the Houses of Parliament and Big Ben.

There is some clever double exposure work, where the girl steps out of the frame and walks down the table.
